a title written by the sword in the blood of that people. There is no doubt about it. We have got now, by the subjugation of that people, a perfect and indefeasible title according to all the laws of war and of nations. So it is "insurrection." It is not always, Mr. President, that such titles are founded in right. I do not undertake to go into that question, but I admit, and not only admit, but assert, that the title of the United States to the Philippine Islands by conquest, if in no other way, is absolute and perfect, and that, therefore, those who oppose the domination of the United States are in insurrection.

And thus so it is, Mr. President, the answer will be made that there is no other way of dealing with the insurrection except by this reconcentrado order. And from these conditions have come the remarkable and astounding evolution that events which had their origin in the utter abhorrence and detestation of the people of the United States with the reconcentrado camps in Cuba have resulted in reconcentrado camps in the Philippine Islands as a necessary policy of the United States; therefore it is that the question is presented directly to the American people, which they should look squarely in the face. Conceding that it is necessary—and there is no other position we can take in honor—are the people of the United States ready and willing to continue a policy which commits them not only to the practice, but which demands of them the justification, of the reconcentrado policy with all its horrors?

If we are to continue in that which caused it, we can not escape by saying that we did not expect this when we went into it, and now it is past; for if it has been necessary in the past it will be necessary again in the future. We may announce that the Philippine question is ended, and all parties in this country may acquiesce in it; we may try to make an end of it; but, Mr. President, 10,000,000 people, in whom there is an almost absolute unanimity—if the soldiers and officers in that country, those who are most directly brought in contact with the people, are to be credited—in their desires for nationality will bide their time, and there will be insurrections; and those insurrections will present again the same conditions as those that now exist, and there must again be barbarities, there must again be reconcentrado camps, a zone of life and a wide area of death and desolation.

And, sir, so long as there is continued the present effort to hold and dominate against their will 10,000,000 people of a different race strongly imbued, not only with the sentiment of nationality but with the passion for nationality, a sentiment so universal and so strong that they are ready to die for it, so long will there be with us the great issue agitating the American people, Shall we keep them in bondage or shall we set them free? The cause for this agitation will not end with the crushing out of the present resistance to American authority. With the widespread and deep-seated passion for Filipino nationality evidenced by their struggle of centuries with the Spaniards and by their determined resistance to American rule, each crushing of rebellion, each pacification by the sword will be followed in time by renewed uprisings and in their turn by bloody repressions.

But, sir, I have hope that this condition will not always continue. For years the ears of our people have been deafened by the roar of victorious cannon, and their eyes have been blinded by the glare of successful war. But at last their attention has been arrested. They are beginning now both to hear and to see. If to maintain American rule there must be these recurring scenes of bloodshed, if to enforce subjection there must be the slaughter of the people and the burning of their cities and towns and the destruction of all their food supplies, the hearts and consciences of at least a part of the American people will cry out against the policy of colonial dominion at so fearful a cost.

Mr. President, I have no excuse or palliation to offer for Filipinos who have been guilty of atrocities upon American soldiers or upon Filipinos who have adhered to the American cause. I have no doubt there have been atrocities and barbarities committed by the Filipinos, and for them I have only execration and condemnation. I make every allowance and give every consideration for harsh measures adopted by American soldiers in retaliation for such cruelties and outrages. But such allowance and such consideration do not furnish the excuse or the palliation set up by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] or the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], for unfortunately for the argument of these Senators the testimony does not show that the water torture has been inflicted to avenge those cruelties and outrages; but it does show its frequent infliction to extort information or to extort confession from the victim. It is a revival of the tortures of the barbaric and middle ages, the purpose of which was by physical torture, by the infliction of inhuman and unbearable physical pain, to wring from the agonized and frenzied victim the confession which was demanded—a confession which the poor wretch finally gives regardless of whether it be true or false—anything to be rid of the excruciating agony, anything to stay the hand of the torturer.

Have our torturers in the Philippines equaled the torturers of the bygone age, when they racked the bones and tore the flesh and snapped the quivering nerves? Mr. President, I know not. I turn from it all in unspeakable horror. I sympathize with the soldier who had been in the Philippines and whose testimony was given before the Senate committee and is found printed in their report. He had not looked upon the torture when inflicted, but he could not shut his ears, and he had heard the agonized groans of the victims. Sir, one can understand how cruelty and outrage on the one hand can provoke and in some cases even justify swift vengeance on the part of the other. One can understand how in the fury of retaliation human life may be ferociously destroyed. But, sir, no outrage can justify deliberate and cruel physical torture. It is from human weakness, true, that cruelty and outrage inflicted by others may so arouse the mighty passions of hate and vengeance that they constitute a palliation for those who in the fury of their passions inflict physical torture upon the perpetrators of these cruelties and outrages. If the tortures inflicted in the Philippines have been inflicted in the outburst of passion in retaliation for cruelties and outrages perpetrated upon American soldiers, then the argument of palliation presented by Senators would be good to the extent of palliation. But, I repeat, these tortures have not been inflicted in retaliation for such cruelties and outrages. The testimony in print and upon our desks is that these tortures were inflicted to extort information and confessions.

Sir, is not this a fearful price? Is it a price the magnitude of which the people of the United States realize? Is it not possible to hope that when they see this river of blood and this country blackened and desolated, the American people will say, "We will not do that which disregards any obligation, but we will find an honorable and safe path out of this horrible situation?"

Mr. President, I am not going to discuss the question which has been raised as to whether or not the atrocities and the outrages and the enormities and the cruelties which have been perpetrated in the Philippine Islands find their justification in precedents created in our civil war. I am not going to discuss it further than to deny it, and I deny it not only for the Southern army, but for the Northern army also.

Sir, as an humble participant in that mighty struggle, a part of the time in the Army of Northern Virginia, I deny it for the Confederate army; and, sir, when I deny it for the Confederate army, is there any Union soldier here who will deny me the right to deny it for the Union Army? Does the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], a gallant soldier in that Army, dispute the correctness of it when I say there was nothing of that kind within the Union Army? Does the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], who followed Sherman across my State in the historic march to the sea, take issue with me in making that denial for the Union Army? Or will the venerable Senator from Connecticut [Mr. HAWLEY], who bore a general's commission in that war, or the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], or the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY], or the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], or any other of those who were gallant soldiers upon the Union side, deny me the right to dispute the proposition that any such atrocities were perpetrated by the Union Army in that struggle?

Mr. President, I have a little excerpt which I will read, from the Washington Post of Sunday last, entitled "A question of national honor," and it is as follows:

> Those Republicans in Congress who have seen fit to condone the alleged atrocities in the Philippines by comparing them with the work of Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan during the civil war can hardly be complimented upon their taste or their regard for the truths of history. Even if their proposition had any warrant in fact, the argument would be beneath contempt. An act of barbarism committed forty years ago does not excuse inhuman cruelty to-day. As well set up the bloody Duke of Alva as a screen for Hell Roaring Jake Smith to hide behind.
> It is not true, however, that the Union armies in the South, or even Quantrell's Confederate guerrillas on the Kansas border, ever practiced such hideous savagery as is charged against certain of our officers in the Philippines. The accusations in question may or may not be well founded—we hope not—but such as they are, true or otherwise, they far exceed in horror anything ever dreamed of in the war of 1861-1865 between the North and South. Every survivor of that tremendous conflict knows that we speak the truth herein. It was a war—a desperate and sanguinary war, a struggle of the Titans—and death and desolation were its fruits. But it was not a ruthless and barbaric orgie, a carnival of ghouls and fiends. To say it is to slander the living and the dead of both sides—the bravest men that ever fought.
> War is a fierce and terrible game—a game where life is staked against life, a game which arouses and sets ablaze all the passions of all the furies of hell. Where the battle rages its flame consumes everything in its path. There is no doubt about that. I have no doubt about the fact that after each army, both North and South, there were camp followers who were guilty of outrages, but as to there having been any suspicion of authority for the infliction of tortures for the purpose of eliciting information or extorting confession or any possibility of official acquiescence therein, or as to there ever having been anything like a reconcentrado camp, with its zone of life and its widespread area of death, nothing of the kind ever occurred in the civil war, and I am prepared here to denounce the insinuation as untrue.

I wish to narrate two little occurrences in that war which indicate the spirit of those who there contended in that high and fearful drama. One of them relates to our honored friend the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS], and I narrate it by his consent. In one of the battles before Vicksburg he was captured and carried as a prisoner before General Grant. He was then Colonel Pettus, and as he appeared before General Grant, the General said to him, "Colonel, what are those troops out in front of me?" Colonel Pettus, with the courtesy which so distinguishes him here, said, "General, I must decline to answer that question." General Grant looked him in the eye a moment, and then in a kindly tone said: "You are right, sir," and turning to an officer by his side he said, "Take this gentleman to the rear and treat him kindly." That was General Grant.

Mr. President, the other is an incident which I have seen narrated about General Lee. It comes from Northern sources. I can not give its exact source, but I have no doubt there are many who are familiar with it, as it has been published a number of times. I first saw it in one of a series of war papers published a number of years ago, I think, in Scribner's or the Century; I have forgotten which—probably in the Century. It was at the close of the battle of Gettysburg, and as General Lee rode from that field, so fateful in the cause of which he was the great pillar and support, he came by a young Federal soldier, a mere boy, lying in the grass wounded. The boy, though wounded and unable to rise, still had in him the fire of battle, and, as he recognized that it was a Confederate general, raised himself upon his elbow and shrieked out a cry for the Union.

General Lee, in that moment of a torture of mind that I presume it is difficult for any of us to realize, got down from his horse and went up to the poor boy, laid his hand tenderly upon his head, and said: "My son, I hope you are not much hurt and that you will soon be well."

There was the spirit with which the North and the South fought in that Titanic war and fought to the death. That there were instances of outrage is true of that war as of all other wars, but in the name of the whole country I deny that they deliberately and avowedly disregarded the laws of civilized warfare and set a precedent for the horrors that have been sworn to as the frequent occurrences in the Philippines. I repudiate the charge, and I hope the American people will repudiate it. I say not only that they have never set and precedent in the past, but they will not approve of or condone it in the present; that they hold the honor of their Army too high to defend the act and thereby assume that it is the act of the Army. But they will stamp upon it as the act of an unlicensed minority of the Army which should be driven from its ranks. That is where the judgment of the whole American people should put it. There is no reason why the aisle in this Chamber should separate Senators in the decision of that question.

Mr. President, it is a difficult thing for me, I confess—it may be that I am what may be considered erratic on the subject—to understand how anybody can regard the Philippine question as a light matter. It is difficult for me to understand how Senators can regard it with levity, as some of them do. It is a difficult thing for me to understand how some Senators, when this great question is in the balance, can consider it a matter not worthy of their time in order that they may be present in the Senate.

But I have passed over one matter about which I wish to say a word. I stated the fact—the most painful and reluctant fact—and which I wish most sincerely could be shown was not the fact, that the reconcentrado policy which had been adopted was necessarily adopted by authority, and I stated that I regarded the reconcentrado policy, with all of its necessary horrible attendants, as on this account a very much more serious matter than the torture business. I stated that in the nature of things it was necessarily a matter within the cognizance of those in authority. But we have more than that. We have the direct authority, sent to the Senate by the Secretary of War, for the statement that they were organized by authority; and I am going to show what that is.

The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] introduced a resolution, which the Senate adopted, as a direction to the Secretary of War to send to the Senate certain orders which had been issued in the Philippine Islands relative to the reconcentrado business. I will read the direction. It is embraced in a letter which the Secretary of War sent to the Senate in response thereto, addressed to the President of the Senate.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 7, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to reply to the following resolution of the Senate, dated May 1, 1902.

Now it quotes the order.

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate the following information:

First—

I beg Senators will mark the particular information called for by the resolution—

First. Whether the orders of Brig. Gen. J. F. Bell, dated Batangas, December 8 and 9, 1901, on the subject of reconcentration, addressed to all station commanders, have been officially received by the War Department; and if so, when they were received, by whom they were forwarded, whether they were issued by authority of the major-general commanding in the Philippines or were approved by him, and whether they have been approved or acquiesced in by the War Department.

Second. A copy of the order or orders issued by Brig. Gen. Jacob H. Smith to Maj. L. W. T. Waller, United States Marine Corps, pleaded by the latter in defense before the recent court-martial which tried him at Manila, if the same were in writing, or the date and substance thereof if they were verbally given. Also (a) whether said order or orders were authorized or have been approved by the major-general commanding in the Philippines; and if so, when they were so approved; (b) when said order or orders were received by the War Department, if they have been received, or when it was first known to the War Department that such order or orders were issued, and (c) whether said order or orders have been revoked or countermanded; and if so, when and by whom, giving the terms of the order of revocation.

The Department says:

First. Two orders by Brig. Gen. J. F. Bell, dated Batangas, December 8 and 9, 1901, addressed to all station commanders, copies of which are annexed hereto, were received by the War Department on the 17th day of January, 1902, from Maj. Gen. Adna R. Chaffee, commanding the division of the Philippines. At the same time the following order by General Bell, dated December 13, 1901, was received at the War Department.

Then there follows in the body of the letter the order of December 13, 1901, but the orders of December 8 and 9, which were specifically called for in the direction of the Senate, are not set out and are not there printed in the RECORD. Now, whether that was an inadvertence or not I do not know. I presume it was. At any rate, the order of December 13 was set out. The orders of December 8 and 9 were not set out, and thereupon a week thereafter the Senator from Texas, noting the fact that the orders had not been set out, procured them and, by request made of the Senate, had them inserted in the RECORD and they are to be found in the RECORD of May 16, 1902.

The order of December 13, 1901, is bad enough, but the orders of December 8 and 9 are infinitely worse. I wish to call attention to the fact that the order of December 8 is an order directly providing for the creation of reconcentrado camps. It is directly in the terms which we used to see published four years ago, issued by Weyler in Cuba. I wish to call attention to the fact, in the reading of this order, that the implication is plain and unavoidable that the reconcentrado camps were to be formed, and that all outside of them was practically doomed to death and destruction. There is practically little difference between the order of General Bell and the order of General Smith, except that Smith went to the extent of prescribing ages, whereas Bell did not make such specification.

Now, it will be seen from the reading that it is a clear order for the creation of reconcentration camps and that the terms of it plainly imply that outside of that it shall be as it is outside this camp, the description of which I read to the Senate, an area in which everything is to be shot, and not only so but an area in which all property is to be destroyed.

To all Station Commanders:

In order to put an end to enforced contributions now levied by insurgents upon the inhabitants of sparsely settled and outlying barrios and districts by means of intimidation and assassination, commanding officers of all towns now existing in the provinces of Batangas and Laguna, including those at which no garrison is stationed at present, will immediately specify and establish plainly marked limits surrounding each town bounding a zone within which it may be practicable with an average-sized garrison to exercise efficient supervision over and furnish protection to inhabitants (who desire to be peaceful) against the depredations of armed insurgents. These limits may include the barrios which exist sufficiently near the town to be given protection and supervision by the garrison, and should include some ground on which live stock could graze, but so situated that it can be patrolled and watched. All ungarrisoned towns will be garrisoned as soon as troops become available.

Commanding officers will also see that orders are at once given and distributed to all the inhabitants within the jurisdiction of towns over which they exercise supervision, informing them of the danger of remaining outside of these limits, and that unless they move by December 25 from outlying barrios and districts with all their movable food supplies, including rice, palay, chickens, live stock, etc., to within the limits of the zone established at their own or nearest town, their property (found outside of said zone at said date) will become liable to confiscation or destruction. The people will be permitted to move houses from outlying districts should they desire to do so, or to construct temporary shelter for themselves on any vacant land without compensation to the owner, and no owner will be permitted to deprive them of the privilege of doing so.

In the discretion of commanding officers the prices of necessities of existence may also be regulated in the interest of those thus seeking protection.

As soon as peaceful conditions have been reestablished in the brigade these persons will be encouraged to return to their homes and such assistance be rendered them as may be found practicable.

J. F. BELL,
Brigadier-General, Commanding.

Replying to the direction of the Senate in the resolution of May 1, 1902, that he report, among other things, whether the foregoing order of December 8 by General Bell and the succeeding order on the next day, December 9, "have been approved or acquiesced in by the War Department," the Secretary of War in his communication to the Senate of May 7, 1902, says as follows:

The War Department has not disapproved or interfered in any way with the orders giving effect to this policy, but has aided in their enforcement by directing an increase of the food supply to the Philippines for the purpose of caring for the natives in the concentration camps.

There is one expression in that order by General Bell of December 8, 1901, which may tend to mislead. I say to mislead; I mean according to my view of its meaning. I refer to that portion which says:

Furnish protection to inhabitants * * * against the depredations of armed insurgents.

As if that were to be done for the protection of the people. But that is strangely inconsistent with a subsequent paragraph, in which a limited time is set within which this must be done or else destruction shall follow without. That is on the 8th.

Then, on the 9th, General Bell follows it with an order which it is too long for me to read in full and which I may ask to put in my remarks at length. I will, however, read part of it, and that much of it will go in:

BATANGAS, December 9, 1901.

To all Station Commanders:

A general conviction, which the brigade commander shares, appears to exist that the insurrection in this brigade continues because the greater part of the people, especially the wealthy ones, pretend to desire but in reality do not want peace.

He is not speaking there of soldiers, of course. He is speaking of the people—those who pretend to want peace.

That when all really want peace we can have it promptly. Under such circumstances it is clearly indicated that a policy should be adopted that will as soon as possible make the people want peace, and want it badly.

He is not talking about soldiers. He is not talking about armed people. He is talking about people at home who are pretending to be peaceable and pretending to want peace, and he proposes that what is prescribed in this order shall be perpetrated, not against soldiers, but against the populace.

Then it goes on for a column and a half of fine print with every possible encouragement to license and violence, and enjoining upon the commanding officers not to restrain the young officers, recognizing the fact that the purpose of the order is that the innocent shall suffer with the guilty, and that there shall be a general destruction of all within that zone, where it is intended to make them want peace, and want it badly, saying what I shall read.

Now, continuing this order, the first paragraph of which I have read—

It is an inevitable consequence of war—

This follows the paragraph in which it is said that the purpose is to make the people who pretend to want peace to really want it and to want it badly. Following immediately after the provision in the order of the day before requiring that there should be concentrado camps—not one, but around every station—it proceeds:

It is an inevitable consequence of war that the innocent must generally suffer with the guilty, for when inflicting merited punishment upon a guilty class it is unfortunately at times impossible to avoid the doing of damage to some who do not individually deserve it. Military necessity frequently precludes the possibility of making discriminations. This is regrettable, but it should be borne in mind that the greatest good to the greatest number can best be brought about by putting a prompt end to insurrection. A short and severe war creates in the aggregate less loss and suffering than benevolent war indefinitely prolonged. For reasons here indicated, which are well known to all, and chief of which is the delay and difficulty in ascertaining the exact truth, it will be impossible to wage war efficiently and at the same time do abstract justice in operations unquestionably essential to putting down an insurrection which has long continued in the territory of this brigade.

Natural and commendable sympathy for suffering and loss and for those with whom friendly relations may have been maintained should therefore take a place subordinate to the doing of whatever may be necessary to bring a people who have not as yet felt the distressing effect of war to a realizing sense of the advantages of peace.

Another paragraph from this order indicates particularly the class of people to be, with their property, specially devoted to destruction:

Another dangerous class of enemies are wealthy sympathizers and contributors, who, though holding no official positions, use all their influence in support of the insurrection, and, while enjoying American protection for themselves, their families, and property, secretly aid, protect, and contribute to insurgents. Chief and most important among this class of disloyal persons are native priests. It may be considered as practically certain that every native priest in the provinces of Batangas and La Laguna is a secret enemy of the Government and in active sympathy with insurgents. These are absolutely our most dangerous enemies—more dangerous even than armed insurgents—because of their unqualified influence. They should be given no exemptions whatever on account of their calling.

Mr. President, read between the lines and taken in connection with the reconcentrado order of the previous day (December 8), what does that mean? What can it mean but an order to every station commander to make a reconcentrado camp, and beyond the limits of that camp to devote to death and destruction all, regardless whether they are innocent or guilty, or whether they are from kindly relations entitled to commiseration and sympathy. It means a destruction so general that it will involve the innocent as well as the guilty, and that the troops must not be deterred in accomplishing this wholesale destruction by the fact that it will involve and destroy the innocent.

It means the organization of a reconcentrado camp at every post within the territory of that brigade, and beyond it everything is to be destroyed in the way of life and property. There is warrant for the opinion that there is little difference between the order of Bell and the order of Smith. Of the order of Smith the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] says in his speech, page 21:

We shudder, and naturally, at the order which is said to have been given, and quoted in the Waller trial, by General Smith.

I wish to read a few sentences from Governor Taft's testimony, which indicate the idea which obtains there as to the extent to which the destruction of property should go. Governor Taft in his testimony, on page 139 of the testimony taken before the committee, in speaking about loyalty required in Batangas, the very territory to which this order of General Bell's particularly applies, said what I shall read:

Governor TAFT. It would seem to follow——

Senator CARMACK. If that were so, then you might excuse such very harsh measures, but only upon that assumption.

Governor TAFT. It would seem to follow, and I think it is more true in Batangas than anywhere else—a reasonable presumption—that if a man's property exposed to the action of the insurgents had not theretofore been destroyed by the insurgents, he had some relation to them which prevented it.

What does that necessarily mean? It means that every vestige of property in that district must be destroyed. If the insurgents destroyed it it was evidence that the man was not in sympathy with the insurgents, but nevertheless his property was destroyed. If it was not destroyed by insurgents it must be destroyed by the Americans, because it was evidence that he was in sympathy with the insurgents. Consequently, according to that rule, the absolute destruction of all property must necessarily follow.

The view stated by Governor Taft was doubtless the view entertained and acted upon by General Bell and his subordinates in the enforcement of this order in the province of Batangas and elsewhere.

Right in this connection I wish to say one word about Governor Taft. I know Governor Taft personally and esteem him very highly. Personally he is a most lovable man. I think him a man of very great ability. I believe him to be a man of absolute integrity. Of course, Governor Taft, charged as he is with a mission in which there is a very fierce contest and a very huge responsibility, must necessarily become a partisan, and I think he has become a partisan and that his views and opinions about matters in the Philippines are necessarily colored by that fact.

I differ from Governor Taft as to a great many of his views and as to a great many of his conclusions. It has been my fortune to have many long conversations with him, and for that reason I know of the difference there is between us. But as to his integrity, as to his truthfulness, as to his loyalty of purpose I have not the slightest misgiving, and as to any statement of fact which he would make I would give him the most unlimited credence. As to his judgment, as to his conclusions, the chances are that we would not agree relative to the Philippines. As an illustration, I know that I differ from him greatly as to his views and opinions of conditions in the Philippines, not on account of what I may know personally, because that is necessarily limited, but because of what I have heard from others who have had the most favorable opportunities for correct observation and information in the islands.

I make this statement in justice to Governor Taft because I believe I know him better than most of the Senators in this Chamber—at least on this side of it—and from my reading of this that he has testified to, and from my criticism upon it it might be thought that I entertained a different opinion. Governor Taft differs most radically in his views of the situation in the Philippine Islands from the vast majority of the officers of the Army in those islands. I have no doubt that he is honest in giving his conclusions, but the fact nevertheless exists that as to the situation there Governor Taft is an optimist and a very enthusiastic one, and that in that he is at variance with the large majority, almost amounting to unanimity, of the officers of the Army who are scattered through the various islands.

I wish to say also with regard to General Chaffee that I know him personally. General Chaffee is a very stern and rugged soldier, but I believe he is an absolutely honest man, and that he is honest in his purposes to attempt to do his duty as he sees it.

It must necessarily be true that both Governor Taft and General Chaffee knew of and indorsed this reconcentrado policy. Governor Taft practically says so in his testimony. Those are matters of opinion as to duty with which I most radically differ from them. I have no doubt in the world that Governor Taft and General Chaffee both take their position upon the ground of necessity. They can only be justified upon the proposition that in order to perform the task which was given them this was necessary.

Personally I do not agree with them as to the necessity justifying those means, but in anything I say I do not wish to impugn the motives or the integrity of either the one or the other. On the contrary, I wish to bear my testimony to what I believe to be the integrity and loftiness of purpose of each of these men. I think they have been placed in a most unfortunate position. I think that it is the fault of the United States Government that these men have been brought face to face with a situation where, in their opinion, they either had to adopt the course they have pursued or stand convicted before the world for the failure of the task which they had undertaken.

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. RAWLINS. In connection with what he has said in relation to General Chaffee, the Senator having met him personally and known his character, I will state that I do not think any of us desire to do him any injustice, but I wish to invite the attention of the Senate to the order or letter of instructions given to General Hughes, and especially to this part of it:

It is to our interest to disarm these people and to keep them disarmed, and any means to that end is advisable.

Prior to this for some two years the torture known as the water cure had been applied for the purpose of getting information as to whereabouts of arms. When I read this order of General Chaffee to General Hughes it seemed to me that it necessarily included a direction to General Hughes to employ torture for the purpose of ascertaining the whereabouts of arms. Perhaps the Senator can give us some information upon that subject.

Mr. BACON. I certainly could not. If I had it I would not give it. I could not appear in the Senate as a witness. I will state, however, that I do not know anything connecting General Chaffee with torture of any kind. I hope and trust, and until I have evidence to the contrary, I will believe that General Chaffee himself has not sanctioned the infliction of torture upon anybody for the purpose of eliciting information.

Mr. SPOONER. That is where the Senator from Georgia differs from the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Utah asked me a question, and I am answering it. I will not believe it, Mr. President. Whether or not there was such a general notoriety of the fact that this torture was inflicted as to make all officers responsible in a degree for the continuance of it, in that they did not suppress it, is another question.

As the Senator asked me about General Chaffee, as I have said, it is a very serious position to put him in—that he had to resort to measures which were not approved by the American people or to stand confessed as a failure. I am very free to say that possibly I would not have so much pride in a question of success as he. I would undoubtedly have said to the American people: "It is impossible to subjugate these people without resorting to these measures, and I will not take the responsibility of doing it." That is what I would have said, and I wish General Chaffee had said it.

Mr. President, I will take opportunity to say one or two things about General Chaffee that I have heard. I do not know whether they are true or not, but in the hope that they are true I should like to put them into the RECORD. One of them I know is true—at least, I have had it from his own lips—but not the one I am now about to relate.

It is a known fact that we have upon our statute books a law which says that no officer of the Army shall receive any pay or emoluments—I am not quoting the exact language—except his pay and such other things as may be provided by law. It is an admitted fact that while in Cuba a number of our officers had been receiving pay in addition to the pay provided by law. I have been informed, and I hope it is true, that when such money was offered to General Chaffee he refused to receive it, and said that the law provided what he should receive and he would take no more. That I have simply heard. I do not know it to be a fact. If it is true, it should go on the record to his lasting honor.

But, Mr. President, I have no doubt about another fact, that in the campaign in China, when other armies and the officers of other armies disgraced civilization by the rioting and the looting and the massacring of the Chinese people, General Chaffee sternly set his influence and his power against it; and while the officers of other armies not only permitted looting, but had the loot collected together and sold at auction and the proceeds divided out, he condemned it without stint and refused to allow anything of that kind to be done by the American army under his command.

Now, Mr. President, I state that because it is due to him. I regret that he has been put into the position he has, and I regret that he took the view of it which he possibly did take. I have no right to say he took it. I repeat, I would have preferred that he had said, "This work can not be done except by the institution of the reconcentrado policy, and I will not permit it."

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. For a question, certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. From the splendid reputation which the Senator has given General Chaffee as to his conduct in China, I judge that the Senator does not agree with the Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] that General Chaffee was schooled in savagery in China?

Mr. BACON. I do not know that that is a legitimate question for the Senator to ask me right now.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Of course if the Senator does not want to answer, I will not insist.

Mr. BACON. I will state that I have a high respect for General Chaffee, and I have very great confidence in his integrity. I think he has viewed matters differently from what I would view them, and I very much regret that he did not take the other course.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, I should like to say a word, if it does not interfere with the Senator?

Mr. BACON. Not in the least.

Mr. RAWLINS. The Senator from Wisconsin took occasion to remark, in view of the question I propounded to the Senator who has the floor, that doubtless I differed with the Senator as to his estimate of General Chaffee. It is fair to say in this connection that I have no personal acquaintance with General Chaffee.

Mr. SPOONER. That is evident.

Mr. RAWLINS. That might be evident, but I do not know that the Senator has any warrant for making an insinuation of that kind. In the course of the remarks which I made I let General Chaffee speak for himself, by his own orders, and I drew no inference from those orders except that which is necessarily implied.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. RAWLINS. Wait until I have completed what I have to say. I shall only be too glad to know that the inference which seemed to be necessarily drawn from those orders was an untrue inference. The Senator from Georgia was speaking in commendation of General Chaffee, being personally acquainted with him, and I called his attention to the language of this order in view of the circumstances under which it was issued. All I care to say in relation to it is that if the order is authentic, and no one denies it, is not the inference inevitable, and can it be disputed?

Mr. SPOONER. What does the Senator say?

Mr. RAWLINS. I say if the inference from this language in the order is inevitable, whatever it may be——

Mr. SPOONER. That is the Senator's opinion.

Mr. RAWLINS. No; because I am giving no opinion. If the inference from the language of the order, which is authentic, is inevitable, I think the Senator understands that it is not any condemnation of General Chaffee; because I have no reason to condemn General Chaffee, but it is General Chaffee's own order which operates to his condemnation.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand the Senator says that the inference is inevitable.

Mr. CARMACK. If it were inevitable.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh!

Mr. RAWLINS. I said if the inference is inevitable. In the question I propounded I read the language, "any means are advisable which will result in the disarmament of the people."

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. RAWLINS. I do not wish to take the Senator from Georgia off the floor.

Mr. BACON. All right.

Mr. RAWLINS. I yield, with the permission of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SPOONER. Had not General Chaffee called the attention of the commanders to General Order 100?

Mr. RAWLINS. General Chaffee and all the officers are presumed to know——

Mr. SPOONER. I did not ask that. Had not General Chaffee called attention in his orders to General Order 100?

Mr. RAWLINS. I do not recall any specific case of that kind. If the Senator says he did I will accept his version of it.

Mr. SPOONER. Does not General Order 100 forbid torture in order to extort confession?

Mr. RAWLINS. Unquestionably it does.

Mr. SPOONER. Then why does the Senator construe that language as a violation by General Chaffee of General Order 100?

Mr. RAWLINS. I have never yet so construed it.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the Senator did.

Mr. RAWLINS. No.

Mr. SPOONER. I know the Senator did in the language he used, although he may have used language he did not intend.

Mr. RAWLINS. What language?

Mr. SPOONER. In the question I put to the Senator I thought he said——

Mr. RAWLINS. No; not to that point.

Mr. CARMACK. It is a very fair inference, in my judgment.

Mr. SPOONER. I expected you to say that.

Mr. CARMACK. I do not care what you expect; it is what I do say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The rules of the Senate do not permit that kind of an interruption.

Mr. SPOONER. I agree entirely with the Chair.

Mr. RAWLINS. I think the Senator from Wisconsin will not mistake my meaning. I read this language from the order of General Chaffee:

It is to our interest to disarm these people and to keep them disarmed, and any means to that end is advisable.

If I may have the Senator's attention, because I do not wish to be misunderstood by him or misinterpreted by him——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me a moment, I should construe that to mean any means consistent with the rules of civilized warfare.

Mr. RAWLINS. And so would I.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator prefers to construe it to be inconsistent with the rules of civilized warfare and to have been so intended. That is where we differ.

Mr. RAWLINS. The Senator has no warrant for stating that I intended to so construe it. In the remarks which I delivered to the Senate I construed it as the Senator says ordinarily it would be construed, but I invite attention to the circumstances in the light of which the order might be interpreted. For two years prior to the issuance of the order in almost every part of the archipelago torture had been employed for the purpose of obtaining information as to the whereabouts of arms. This was known to Governor Taft; it was known to General Hughes, to whom these instructions were given; it was a matter of common knowledge in the army in the Philippines at the time these instructions were given.

What I wanted was if I could to obtain some light as to what would be the understanding of this language by General Hughes, to whom it was addressed, when he says "Any means to that end is advisable." Did he mean by that to say that the continuance of a practice which had been prevalent to that end would be advisable? With the permission of the Senator from Georgia I ask the Senator from Wisconsin, who is a lawyer who understands well the rules that every written document must be construed in the light of the circumstances under which it is written, if that language would not afford reasonable ground for subordinate commanders to put upon it a construction that thereby the commander in chief of the forces in the islands authorized the employment of torture as a means of disarming these people and keeping them disarmed, that being one of the means which had been employed to that end at the time and prior to the issuance of the instructions themselves.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not wish to enter into a discussion on matters suggested by the inquiries of Senators. I repeat that I have a very high regard for General Chaffee, and I think he has been placed in a most unfortunate position. If I am in error about this I would be delighted, but I think the record shows that General Chaffee must have known of the reconcentrado order.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BACON. I have no objection in the world. I shall be more than gratified if the Senator can relieve me of that impression.

Mr. FORAKER. I dislike exceedingly to interrupt the Senator from Georgia, because he has been interrupted so much that it would seem like we might wear out his patience; but General Chaffee is on record with respect to the reconcentration order, and if it would not interrupt the Senator too much——

Mr. BACON. I will be delighted if the Senator can show that the General did not know about it.

Mr. FORAKER. In Senate Document 347, at page 22, is found a full report from Arthur L. Wagner, colonel, Adjutant-General's Department, of an inspection of the reconcentrado camp, and following the report in this printed document is an indorsement by Gen. Loyd Wheaton, who was the commanding general there, and then following that is an indorsement by General Chaffee, major-general, United States Army, commanding. This matter covers two or three pages, which I want to put in the RECORD, I intended really to read it, but I do not think it would be fair to the Senator for me to read it at this time.

Mr. BACON. I suggest to the Senator that I would be perfectly willing to put it in as an appendix to my remarks, so that it all may come out together.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Why does the Senator use the word "reconcentrado?"

Mr. FORAKER. Because that is the word that is used by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; but it was not a reconcentrado policy.

Mr. BACON. That is what it was called in Cuba.

Mr. SPOONER. It was so called in Cuba, but——

Mr. CARMACK. The Senator from Wisconsin wants to Americanize the word as he has the policy.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Tennessee is wittier than he is wise in that observation.

Mr. FORAKER. Inasmuch as the Senator from Georgia gives me permission, I will read the report of the adjutant-general who inspected the concentration camps.

Mr. BACON. I will consent on condition that the Senator will put it in as an appendix to my remarks—not in the body of my speech.

Mr. FORAKER. I will put it in as an appendix.

Mr. BACON. I have no objection to that.

Mr. FORAKER. I will read it now.

Mr. BACON. The Senator may do it now.

Mr. FORAKER. It is rather lengthy. It covers two or three pages, and if the Senator is not very forbearing it may wear out his patience, and I do not want to do that.

Mr. BACON. I will suggest to the Senator that he read the paper when I get through, and it may then appear in connection with this debate. I have no objection to the Senator reading what he desires, though I do not know what it is.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the Senator not read certain portions now in order that we may see the point he desires to make?

Mr. FORAKER. I want to show the nature of these concentration camps and to show that they are as widely different from the Weyler concentration or reconcentration camps, whichever you may see fit to call them, as civilization is from barbarism. Here now is an official report, and I want to read it in answer to the letter which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] read a while ago. The Senator's letter was written by some officer of the Army for whom he vouches, but the name of that officer has not been given to us.

I propose to read an official report made by an officer whose standing in the Army no one can question, an officer of high rank, and it is manifest from what he says here that his statement is a carefully prepared one and an absolutely truthful one. Then I want to show, following his report, what General Chaffee and General Wheaton indorsed upon it, as to the necessity for doing what they did do, and that what they did do was intended as an act of mercy, and that was the result of it. Nobody suffered any harshness on account of it, but it was done to protect people who were otherwise defenseless from people from whom they needed protection; but as the Senator suggests that he does not care to have this report interpolated in the middle of his speech I will wait until he concludes, and then I will put it in the RECORD.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I presume it is true that there have been precautions taken in the Philippine Islands which have not permitted the famines which occurred in the reconcentrado camps in Cuba.

As I before stated, I can not be led into making any statement upon my own responsibility, and will not, but I am very anxious that there shall be an examination of this matter and other matters connected with it by committees of Congress who shall go to the Philippine Islands. I am perfectly satisfied that a full and complete understanding of the situation there and all the occurrences there will never be had from any source until an investigation is made in that way.

The impression I have, and to which I directed the attention of the Senate, which horrified me at the idea of reconcentration or concentration—if the Senator prefers that word—being adopted as the policy of the American Army and justified as a proper method of warfare—I say that that impression is not so much as to what occurs in the camp as to what occurs out of it. But I hope, in justice to ourselves, in order that the American people may know what they are doing, in order that they may guide themselves aright—and they will guide themselves aright if they know—that the Senate and the House of Representatives will see to it that the legislative branch of the Government, through its own members, shall visit the spot and learn the full truth.

Why, Mr. President, there are a good many little things that are beginning to crop out that cast light on this question. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] the other day read, I think, from Dr. Schurman a statement of the humanity of the American Army. I am not prepared to state anything of my own knowledge, but whenever there is an investigation made I have absolute confidence that it will be found that up to the time and after the time that Dr. Schurman wrote, and while he was there, the methods of warfare which were pursued were the methods of warfare practiced among civilized nations, confined to those methods, and that afterwards, for the reasons stated, the conditions were such, the impossibility of dealing with the situation was such, that this changed process was adopted.

Now, there is a little matter here which sheds great light on that.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that Governor Taft is an equally credible man with Dr. Schurman?

Mr. BACON. I certainly do. I know Governor Taft, while I do not know Dr. Schurman.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Governor Taft has also made statements quite as strong as has Dr. Schurman regarding the humanity of the American soldiers since the time that Dr. Schurman spoke of. So that if Governor Taft is equally credible with Dr. Schurman, and the Senator accepts Dr. Schurman's statement, he is bound likewise to accept Governor Taft's statement.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am just stating what I believe. I have no doubt Governor Taft stated what he believed. Governor Taft was in Manila; he was not out on the firing line or the burning lines either.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. He has been all over the islands.

Mr. BACON. Yes, I know; but, Mr. President, as I say, there are little matters which drop out which point pretty unerringly to what the conditions are and what the occurrences have been.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] in his speech the other day incorporated something that I had not seen before, which casts some light on this question, about reconcentration and about the zone of death outside of the zone of life, the burning of houses, the destruction of life and of property. It is an extract from the report of Brig. Gen. J. F. Bell, commanding First District, Department of Northern Luzon, Part 3, Report of Lieutenant-General Commanding the Army, 1901, pages 34, 35. This I read from the pamphlet copy of the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts, delivered on the 5th of May, and appearing on page 26. This is what General Bell says in his report:

I have been in Indian campaigns—

That was in 1901. Possibly, if the report was in 1901, this was the preceding winter—

I have been in Indian campaigns where it took over 100 soldiers to capture each Indian, but the problem here is more difficult on account of the inbred treachery of these people, their great number, and the impossibility of recognizing the actively bad from the only passively so. If it was deemed advisable—

This is the sentence to which I call attention—

If it was deemed advisable to pursue the methods of European nations and armies in suppressing rebellions among Asiatics, the insurrection could have been easily put down months ago; even now, although the seeds of rebellion have permeated all classes, such methods would soon put an end to all active insurrection

Sir, what does that mean? It simply means that up to that time the American Army had been pursuing methods recognized as legitimate in warfare between civilized nations. We all know what is meant by the methods pursued by European nations and European armies in dealing with insurrections in Asia. We know the harshness, the cruelties, the wholesale slaughter, and the absolute indifference to life in the wholesale with which European nations deal with insurrections among Asiatics; and here is the distinct proposition from General Bell in his official report.

He practically says we are waging war along civilized lines and according to civilized rules and we can not put down this insurrection; but if you will throw aside these restraints, if you will turn us loose to burn and slaughter and to massacre and to perpetrate all species of cruelty and barbarity known to the history of wars in Asia, we will put down this rebellion and this insurrection. What else can it mean? If it was not intended that there should be a threat of throwing aside the rules of civilized warfare, why make the suggestion? What else can the suggestion mean but that we shall put aside the rules of civilized warfare which had been observed theretofore, and

Come hot from hell,
Cry "Havoc," and let slip the dogs of war.

Mr. President, I do not desire to turn to that branch of the question suggested by Senators, because my purpose in alluding to it was not through any desire to bring condemnation upon these officers. I should be only delighted in every vindication that can be made of them, consistently with what has actually occurred. But I am not willing that the lesson, which I think should be drawn from this matter, should be lost by failing to mention whatever is necessary to bring it home to the American people.

In connection with this order of General Bell, I simply wish to point the Senate to a statement as to the character of the people in Batangas Province, to which these orders were made to apply and to which they most directly applied.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. By whom was that statement made?

Mr. BACON. This statement is made by the friend of the Senator—Señor Calderon.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am very glad to have the Senator establish a relationship of which I was not aware until he stated it.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon. I understood from what the Senator said to me that there was a relation of friendship between them.

The book from which I read is the report of the first Philippine Commission. It is part of the testimony which that Commission took. Señor Calderon, with whom I am not personally acquainted, but who is personally known to the Senator from Indiana, was examined under oath on the 27th of April, 1899. This is his testimony. I am only going to read one or two questions and answers.

Examined by Professor Worcester:

Q. What is your profession?
A. Lawyer and farmer.
Q. Where do you live?
A. I have always lived in Manila, but I have property in the provinces of Batangas and Cavite.
Q. What proportion of the people of Batangas can read and write?
A. Seventy-five or 80 per cent. The province is the most cultured in the archipelago. I have some 600 laborers on my plantation in Batangas, and of those there are certainly not more than 20 who can not read and write.

I am reading from page 67, volume 2, Report of the Philippine Commission, 1900—the first Schurman Commission.

Mr. President, it is very warm and I am physically very much exhausted. I have not completed what I wish to say. If the Senate will permit me to conclude in the morning, I will try not to be unduly lengthy, and I shall esteem it as a favor.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course I do not want to press the Senator to continue; but the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WELLINGTON] notified me that he would like to go on to-morrow morning after the routine morning business.

Mr. BACON. I do not think it makes any special difference. If the Senator from Massachusetts thinks that the notice requires that the Senator from Maryland shall proceed in the morning, I shall be willing to complete my speech after the Senator from Maryland shall have concluded.

Mr. LODGE. Very well.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I do not wish to make any extended remarks, but I do wish to do, as the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] does not desire to proceed further to-day, what I announced a few moments ago I would take occasion to do whenever he yielded the floor.

Mr. BACON. Very well. I have yielded the floor for to-day.

Mr. FORAKER. I wanted, when I interrupted the Senator, to call his attention to the report of which I then spoke, made by Colonel Wagner, of the Adjutant-General's Department, of an inspection which he had made of these concentration camps. The Senator from Georgia read the order of General Bell under which these camps were established. I wish to call attention to the fact that in this order General Bell sets out the necessity for it, and that I may give the exact language I want to read that portion of his order. He says:

To all Station Commanders:

In order to put an end to enforced contributions now levied by insurgents upon the inhabitants of sparsely settled and outlying barrios and districts by means of intimidation and assassination, commanding officers of all towns now existing in the provinces of Batangas and Laguna, including those at which no garrison is stationed at present, will immediately specify and establish plainly marked limits surrounding each town bounding a zone within which it may be practicable with an average-sized garrison to exercise efficient supervision over and furnish protection to inhabitants (who desire to be peaceful) against the depredations of armed insurgents. These limits may include the barrios which exist sufficiently near the town to be given protection and supervision by the garrison, and should include some ground on which live stock could graze, but so situated that it can be patrolled and watched. All ungarrisoned towns will be garrisoned as soon as troops become available.

The Senator from Georgia read that order and put it into the RECORD—an order which sets forth that it was issued for those reasons to which I have just called attention—and then the Senator proceeded to say that, in pursuance of that order, concentration camps had been established in the Philippines, which he likened to the concentration camps established by Weyler in Cuba. He elaborated that statement; but I content myself with simply referring to it, and now with reading a description of Weyler's concentration camps, in order that we may have in mind that to which the Senator from Georgia likened the concentration camps established by General Bell.

I read from page 349 of The History of Our War with Spain, by Henry B. Russell. On this page he gives a descriptive account of the concentration camps as they existed under Weyler. He says:

The helpless people were alloted ground near the towns, almost invariably in low-lying, swampy, and malarious places. The Spanish residents would not be burdened with them and generally cared not how soon they died. They were concentrated in greatest numbers where the accomodations were least adequate, as if extermination were the main object. There was nothing for them to do and there was less and less for them to eat, and finally they stretched out upon the damp ground, gazing vacantly before them as the weary days dragged by. Mothers lay listless with dead babes in their arms. The quick and the dead lay side by side till the latter were taken out and thrown into the dead carts and carried off into the country, where lay the half-buried bodies of hundreds of victims of this system of warfare. The huts of these people were jammed together in rows, with but a few inches of space between, and the ground was covered with filth. Diseases of malignant types claimed their victims everywhere and every day. There was no medical attendance; it was fortunate if there were half rations. In the different stations of concentration there were estimated to be over 400,000 of these helpless people, and by the summer of 1897 the death rate had become terrible. The beautiful island was a plague spot upon earth.

Mr. President, everyone familiar with the literature of that time, the official as well as the unofficial literature, giving us an account of what was going on in Cuba, will recognize that the statement I have read is not exaggerated. The concentration camps of Weyler were even more barbarous and more revolting and more horrible than this description gives us an idea of. I call attention to this, Mr. President, in order that we may have the measure of that to which the Senator from Georgia has likened the concentration camps established by J. Franklin Bell.

General Bell in his order has told of the necessity for it; that it was not in order that he might better protect American troops, but it was solely that he might protect the friendly Filipinos who did not want to go to war with us from assassination and murder at the hands of the insurrectionists who infested that district. That was his reason. As to whether it is a good one or a bad one men may differ, but I do not differ from General Bell about it. I think it was a wise and proper order for him to make and a wise and proper provision for him to make under the circumstances. No man can judge what is wise and proper until he calls to mind what the circumstances were and the necessities for such an order.

Mr. President, I do not mean when I say that to justify General Bell in establishing and maintaining such concentration camps as Weyler established and maintained in Cuba, but concentration camps such as the concentration camps that in fact he did establish.

Now, what were those concentration camps? Were they such barbarous and revolting camps as those the description of which I have just read? Not at all, Mr. President. Here is an official description of these concentration camps, and I want to read it. It is a little bit lengthy, but there is not an unnecessary or superfluous line in it, and every line in it is a refutation of the statement made by the Senator from Georgia in this regard. This is the official report of Arthur L. Wagner, colonel, Adjutant-General's Department, adjutant-general, and it is dated "Headquarters Department of North Philippines, Manila, P. I., March 22, 1902." It is addressed to General Wheaton, commanding the Department of North Philippines, Manila, P. I. It says:

SIR: I have the honor to report that, in accordance with your verbal orders, I proceeded on the 16th instant on the gunboat Napindan to Calamba, and thence overland to Santo Tomas and Tanauan, at which points I inspected the concentration camps of the natives. I inspected the camp at the former place on the 16th instant and the two camps at the latter town on the following day. On the 18th instant I returned to Manila.

The camp or village at Santo Tomas contains about 8,000 people and covers a space about 2 miles long by 1 mile wide. The people are not unduly crowded, their houses are clean and comfortable, and the streets and grounds of the camp are well policed and scrupulously neat. The houses are in every respect as good as those in the barrios evacuated by the natives, with the exception that in most instances they are smaller. There is, however, no uncomfortable crowding, as the native houses in this archipelago are a mere protection from sun and rain and are generally sufficiently open to allow a very free circulation of air. The people from the same barrios are quartered on the same streets, the communities being kept together and the people having the same neighbors they have been accustomed to at home.

The health of the people in the camp at Santo Tomas was very good, sickness being practically nil. The camp is under the general charge of the medical officer at Santo Tomas, with a practicante as assistant in each barrio.

There is sufficient food on hand to last until the 1st of May, and the reserve of palay in the church will probably provide subsistence for another month. There are plenty of pigs about the camp, though chickens are getting scarce. Many of the chickens in the barrios were not brought to the concentration camp, but were left behind, and have since become wild. Many of them will probably be available for food when the people get back to their barrios. The people will also be able to get fruits (principally bananas) in abundance, besides squashes and a species of bread fruit. The stock is allowed to graze within the dead line, and they evidently find good grazing in this space, as they seem to be in good condition.

Care is taken to provide against fire by having sections of bamboo, filled with water, resting in a rack at each end of each barrio, and in case of a long street at convenient points between. There are also sections of bamboo filled with water resting on the roofs of nearly all the houses, two sections of bamboo being tied together and slung across the ridgepole of the roof. Hooks on long poles are also provided for the rapid demolition of houses in case of fire.

The people in the camp at Santo Tomas had all been inspected and vaccinated.

Then he goes on to describe the camps at other places in substantially the same manner. I will not stop to read the whole of this report, but will insert it in full. He further says:

Each barrio—

I commence to read now about the awful dead line of which we have been told so much—

Each barrio has an outpost, marked with a flag, on the dead line. Each outpost consists of four natives, and is relieved every twenty-four hours. The outposts have orders in case they see any natives trying to go beyond the line to turn them back, and there is a saddled pony at each outpost to give warning in case anyone gets beyond the line. While natives beyond the dead line are liable to be shot, such a measure is never resorted to if it is possible to arrest them and turn them back to the camp. No cases—

I wish every Senator to note this—

No cases of shooting people passing the dead line have yet been reported, and, as nearly as I can ascertain, none have occurred.

I omit to read a portion of the report at this point, and call attention now to the following. Remember I am reading this to contrast our concentration camps with the concentration camps established by Weyler. This report further says:

There is a school in each barrio, where instruction is given by native teachers acting under the general supervision of the teacher at Tanauan. These children look as happy and contented as any school children in the United States. As we rode through the village they were given a recess to meet us, and called out cheerily, smilingly, and in good English, the salutation "Good morning," which had been taught them.

I was unable to find among these people anywhere any evidences of misery or neglect. The hombres or common people are perfectly contented and have no desire to leave. They have scarcely more power of intelligent initiative than the same number of cattle; they are accustomed to doing what they are told, whether the order comes from Spaniard, American, or one of the gentes finas of their own race; they accept the present conditions without complaint, and I am informed that it will be a matter of considerable difficulty to break up these barrios when the time comes to do so. It is gratifying to know that such hardships as exist fall upon the wealthy classes, and that it can no longer be said of the insurrection that it is "a rich man's war and a poor man's fight."

So it goes on to the end. There is only one other paragraph which I will stop to read:

The term "concentration" has doubtless become odious to the people of the United States, because of the course pursued in Cuba under the administration of Weyler. There is, however, one very important difference between the Spanish system of concentration and that used at these camps, namely, that while many of the Cuban reconcentrados were starved, in these camps all are well fed. I was unable to find in any of these great camps any evidence in the slightest degree of the want, misery, and squalor that are so evident in our best-managed and presumably humane Indian agencies within the limits of the United States, where the policy of concentration has long been carried out by our Government in opposition to the wishes of the Indians, who preferred to run wild and conduct war at their own pleasure.

I ask that the whole of this report may be printed in the RECORD. The report referred to is as follows:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF NORTH PHILIPPINES,
Manila, P. I., March 22, 1902.

SIR: I have the honor to report that, in accordance with your verbal orders, I proceeded on the 16th instant on the gunboat Napindan to Calamba, and thence overland to Santo Tomas and Tanauan, at which points I inspected the concentration camps of the natives. I inspected the camp at the former place on the 16th instant and the two camps at the latter town on the following day. On the 18th instant I returned to Manila.

The camp or village at Santo Tomas contains about 8,000 people and covers a space about 2 miles long by 1 mile wide. The people are not unduly crowded, their houses are clean and comfortable, and the streets and grounds of the camp are well policed and scrupulously neat. The houses are in every respect as good as those in the barrios evacuated by the natives, with the exception that in most instances they are smaller. There is, however, no uncomfortable crowding, as the native houses in this archipelago are a mere protection from sun and rain and are generally sufficiently open to allow a very free circulation of air. The people from the same barrios are quartered on the same streets, the communities being kept together and the people having the same neighbors they have been accustomed to at home.

The health of the people in the camp at Santo Tomas was very good, sickness being practically nil. The camp is under the general charge of the medical officer at Santo Tomas, with a practicante as assistant in each barrio.

There is sufficient food on hand to last until the 1st of May, and the reserve of palay in the church will probably provide subsistence for another month. There are plenty of pigs about the camp, though chickens are getting scarce. Many of the chickens in the barrios were not brought to the concentration camp, but were left behind, and have since become wild. Many of them will probably be available for food when the people get back to their barrios. The people will also be able to get fruits (principally bananas) in abundance, besides squashes and a species of bread fruit. The stock is allowed to graze within the dead line, and they evidently find good grazing in this space, as they seem to be in good condition.

Care is taken to provide against fire by having sections of bamboo, filled with water, resting in a rack at each end of each barrio, and in case of a long street at convenient points between. There are also sections of bamboo filled with water resting on the roofs of nearly all the houses, two sections of bamboo being tied together and slung across the ridgepole of the roof. Hooks on long poles are also provided for the rapid demolition of houses in case of fire.

The people in the camp at Santo Tomas had all been inspected and vaccinated.

At Tanauan there are two camps—one, known as the north town, being approximately in the form of a square about one-third of a mile on each side. The south town covers a space about one-half of a mile long by one-third of a mile wide. There are 11 barrios in the former and 15 in the latter. In the two camps there are about 19,000 people, of which number 11,000 are in the south town and the rest in the other camp. In these camps, as in the one at Santo Tomas, each barrio is assigned to a street by itself, so that neighbors are not separated from each other.

There has been considerable sickness among the children in the camps at Tanauan, measles having broken out, followed in many cases by pneumonia. The death rate, however, is not greater than the native villages under ordinary conditions, and the mortality from pneumonia has been largely due to the unusually cold weather of last month. Of course, the term "cold weather" is a relative term, but it should be borne in mind that the poor people in this climate probably suffer as much from cold in a temperature of 50° or 60° above zero as the people in Minnesota or the Dakotas would in a temperature of 30° or 40° below. Great care is taken to guard against disease, the camp being under the personal supervision of the medical officer stationed at Tanauan, who also has a native practicante in each barrio, the native practicante having in some cases several assistants. These practicantes, I may state, seem to understand their work and to conduct it with intelligence. Here, at Santo Tomas, all the people have been inspected in regard to smallpox and vaccinated with most satisfactory results.

There is food enough in the camps at Tanauan to last until the 31st of March—perhaps until the middle of April. The rich people have plenty of rice, which they will be compelled to sell as soon as the rice of the poor people is exhausted. It is believed that this reserve rice will be sufficient for the people until the 30th of April. Pigs and chickens are still to be seen around the camps, the former in considerable numbers, though the latter are said to have become rather scarce. The people are allowed to take their cattle out every day beyond the dead line * to graze, and they are also allowed to gather forage and bring it in.

Each barrio has an outpost, marked with a flag, on the dead line. Each outpost consists of four natives, and is relieved every twenty-four hours. The outposts have orders in case they see any natives trying to go beyond the line to turn them back, and there is a saddled pony at each outpost to give warning in case anyone gets beyond the line. While natives beyond the dead line are liable to be shot, such a measure is never resorted to if it is possible to arrest them and turn them back to the camp.

No cases of shooting people passing the dead line have yet been reported, and, as nearly as I can ascertain, none have occurred. In the church and inclosure at Tanauan there are 127 female prisoners, all of whom are legitimate prisoners of war, who could be tried by military commission under the provisions of General Orders, No. 100, for their work as spies, collectors, etc. Forty women with children are provided with separate quarters, having been given the best available house for this purpose in town. Any woman becoming ill is released on parole. In the guardhouse there are 270 military prisoners, who are fed on the Government ration allowed prisoners, and who are probably getting better food than they have ever before had in the course of their entire existence.

There is a school in each barrio, where instruction is given by native teachers acting under the general supervision of the teacher at Tanauan. These children look as happy and contented as any school children in the United States. As we rode through the village they were given a recess to meet us, and called out cheerily, smilingly, and in good English the salutation "Good morning," which had been taught them.

I was unable to find among these people anywhere any evidences of misery or neglect. The hombres or common people are perfectly contented and have no desire to leave. They have scarcely more power of intelligent initiative than the same number of cattle; they are accustomed to doing what they are told, whether the order comes from Spaniard, American, or one of the gentes finas of their own race; they accept the present conditions without complaint, and I am informed that it will be a matter of considerable difficulty to break up these barrios when the time comes to do so. It is gratifying to know that such hardships as exist fall upon the wealthy classes, and that it can no longer be said of the insurrection that it is "a rich man's war" and "a poor man's fight."

Caste is strongly marked among the Tagalos, and the upper-class aristocrats do not fancy their enforced association with the democratic herd. As far as possible, however, neighbors are kept together and the caste spirit is shocked just enough to excite amusement rather than pity in the mind of an American. The rich people have lost heavily because they have not been able to harvest their orange crop and can not give their personal attention to their estates. They undoubtedly yearn earnestly for peace, and for the first time they are trying to bring it about. They deserve but little sympathy in their unhappiness, for it is they who have sustained the war, and it is but just that the pinch of the concentration should be felt by them. It should be repeated with emphasis that the distress incident to war falls in this case not upon the poor, but upon the rich, who have been perfectly willing to oppose the Americans so long as the hardships and dangers fell almost exclusively upon the hombres, while the distinction and position of "patriot" leaders were monopolized by themselves.

The term "concentration" has doubtless become odious to the people of the United States, because of the course pursued in Cuba under the administration of Weyler. There is, however, one very important difference between the Spanish system of concentration and that used at these camps, namely, that while many of the Cuban reconcentrados were starved, in these camps all are well fed. I was unable to find in any of these great camps any evidence in the slightest degree of the want, misery, and squalor that are so evident in our best-managed and presumably humane Indian agencies within the limits of the United States, where the policy of concentration has long been carried out by our Government in opposition to the wishes of the Indians, who preferred to run wild and conduct war at their own pleasure.

The effect of this system has been to produce practically a condition of peace in the provinces to which it has been applied. The insurgent leaders who are still out have scarcely any followers, being in small parties and in concealment, living in caves, hiding by day, prowling by night, and claiming to be the titled representatives of a government. It is said that they are largely sustained by the hope of material financial assistance from the junta of Hongkong, and there is no doubt that they are morally supported and strongly sustained by the public expressions of sympathy made by certain prominent persons in the United States.

In conclusion, so long as it is impossible to adopt the Sermon on the Mount as a guiding treatise on the art of war a certain degree of misery will be inseparable from a condition of war; but as far as the concentration camps are concerned, misery is reduced to a minimum, and the management of the military authorities has been so beneficent that I believe that the common people in the camps are actually more happy and comfortable than they were in their own villages.

Very respectfully,

ARTHUR L. WAGNER,
Colonel, Adjutant-General's Department, Adjutant-General.

Maj. Gen. LOYD WHEATON, U. S. A.,
Commanding Department of North Philippines, Manila, P. I.

Mr. FORAKER. Now, on this report is the following indorsement by General Wheaton:

[First indorsement.]

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF NORTH PHILIPPINES,
Manila, P. I., March 24, 1902.

Respectfully forwarded to the Adjutant-General of the Army, Washington, D. C.

This report illustrates the conditions existing in the towns where the inhabitants have been assembled. This concentration was made for the purpose of protecting the natives from the guerrilla bands in the provinces of Laguna and Batangas.

After more than two years' occupation of these provinces it has been found impossible to exterminate these bands or capture their leaders, owing to the reign of terror which they exercised over the inhabitants. Their systematic assassination—sometimes of burying alive—of natives who refused to contribute to the support of the insurrection, enabled them to wring a steady war revenue from people presumably enjoying the privileges of free government and the protection of the United States. This has now terminated; nearly all the arms in the hands of guerrillas have been captured or have been surrendered, and there is a prospect of an early termination of disturbed conditions in provinces under military control. It is expected that within sixty days people assembled in the towns can be returned to their several places of former abode.

LOYD WHEATON,
Major-General, Commanding.

Now, Mr. President, we are officially informed that in less than sixty days from the time when he wrote this, as he predicted, they were able to dismiss those people to their homes and to abandon those camps, the work which they were designed to do when they established those camps having been accomplished. Now, what was that work? I have already read what it was. What was the purpose of this act which has been charged to be an act of brutality, but which I think is officially reported to be an act of mercy and an act of gentleness and an act of kindness?

Its sole purpose was to enable our Army to rid those provinces in which these concentration camps were established of the banditti and guerrillas and murderers and assassins who were carrying on war not alone against our Army, but also and even more particularly against the people of their own island for no other offense committed by them than acts of friendship to the American cause. That was the whole purpose, in order that the Army might, all friendly people having been gathered within the protection of the American Army, sally out and pursue those people and put an end to that kind of depredation and to that kind of savagery and to that kind of uncivilized warfare. It was successful. There is the indorsement of General Wheaton. There are the reasons assigned by General Bell in giving his order.

Who is to question these statements? Are not these officers of high rank in the American Army honorable men? Is not their statement to be accepted in the United States Senate against the statement of any man whose mere letter is read and whose name is withheld? I would not disparage at all the officer whose letter the Senator from Georgia read, because the Senator from Georgia has vouched for him, but until he gives his name and we know who he is I am going to accept the statement of General Wheaton and the statement of General Bell, men known all over the United States and men who have the confidence and the esteem and the regard of the American people, not only as efficient and capable soldiers, not only as commanding generals of merit, but as men of high character and men whose word the people of the United States will accept.

They tell us why they established these concentration camps. They point out that it was a matter of necessity and a matter of mercy, and they point out the character of the camps, and that instead of establishing them in low, swampy ground, as Weyler established his camps, and instead of denying medical attendance and full rations and adequate room and all the necessaries to enable them to be comfortable, they were supplied with everything of the sort; their camps were put upon high and healthy ground; they were given an abundance of room; houses were built especially for them; streets were laid out; people of the same community were gathered together in the same neighborhood in the camps of concentration so established, in order that the neighborly communication to which they had been accustomed might be continued under the new conditions enforced by the Army.

Not only were they supplied with medical attendance, but there was a medical officer in charge of each camp and a medical practitioner in each barrio or subdivision of the camp. They were given every kind of attention, and the health of the camp was as good as the health of the people at their own homes, and in order that they might be provided against the contagious disease of smallpox everyone was vaccinated. Every care that humanity and mercy could suggest was exercised with respect to them.

Now, following General Wheaton's indorsement comes this indorsement from General Chaffee. I desire it to go into the RECORD, and therefore I will read it.

HEADQUARTERS DIVISION OF THE PHILIPPINES,
Manila, P. I., March 25, 1902.

Respectfully forwarded to the Adjutant-General of the Army.

It is useless for me to make an attempt to show the necessity for the course adopted in the Third and Sixth Brigades to put an end to the active insurrection existing there in such a way that all persons will agree that right action has been taken.

He knew there would be Senators who would not agree with him, no matter what he might say. I suppose that is what he had reference to. Then he goes on:

It is impossible, of course, for me to do this. I will state, however, that personal contact with the people, a knowledge of their methods and sentiments, a personal acquaintance with the terrain and what may be done by an enemy as by troops are all essential to determine what should be done before condemning what has been done. It is also necessary that some other method be suggested and positive proof submitted that had it been followed more success correspondingly would have followed its adoption than has been secured by the present course.

I do not understand that the authority of the United States in these islands can be indefinitely disputed by armed forces without efforts to terminate the resistance to that authority. On the other hand, I understand that all means which are justified by the laws of war are to be applied in such form as will meet and defeat the method of warfare adopted by the enemy. If desperate in the last case, more desperate must be the attack to end it.

Every care has been taken that people required to remain under military surveillance shall not unduly suffer for food, shelter, or medical attendance, if needed.

ADNA R. CHAFFEE,
Major-General, U. S. A., Commanding.

On page 5 of the same document is another report to the Commissary-General of Subsistence by the chief commissary of the Division of the Philippines, March 17, 1902. He also was familiar with the camps and had occasion to report upon them, and I wish to read briefly from what he says:

We are getting along very nicely in supplying rice to the natives who are concentrated in Batangas and Laguna provinces. Last week, in company with General Wheaton, I visited Binan, Calamba, Santo Tomas, Tanauan, and Lipa, and the way the concentration of the natives is carried out up there is a credit to the United States Army. Generals Wheaton and Bell both deserve a great deal of credit.

Instead of being called "camps of concentration" the proper name would be "camps of instruction and sanitation." The different barrios, or little villages, are gathered—each barrio—on a street or avenue by itself. Then these different avenues are separated by about 200 feet from their back yards, where they do their cooking, burn up the offal, etc. They have their fire brigades, armed with buckets of bamboo about 6 or 8 feet long. These are grouped on racks every 200 or 300 feet, and every house is required to keep two of these filled at night. The houses are about as comfortable as those they were required to vacate. They all have an abundance of food, either collected by themselves or furnished by the military authorities.

The inhabitants are most respectful and very cheerful looking. They all have the appearance of being well fed. No indications of sullenness or discontent. Their herds are taken out to graze, and I really think, outside of a military standpoint, the natives will be decidedly improved by virtue of having lived in these well-regulated camps of instruction and sanitation. The very poor are much better off in every way than they ever were before, and they are subject by the military to less tyranny than formerly by the headsmen. From a military standpoint, of course, the concentration has been most valuable and has resulted in bringing in nearly every gun and every insurgent behind it who has not fled to the province of Cavite and Tabayas, which are under the control of the civil government.

Following that, and as vindicating the prophecy made by Colonel Wagner in his report that within sixty days from the time he wrote they might be able to send the people back to their homes, I read the following:

MANILA, May 5, 1902.

ADJUTANT-GENERAL, Washington:

* * * * * * *

With reference to your telegram of the 3d, natives Laguna Province collected under orders Brig. Gen. J. Franklin Bell allowed to return home more than a month ago. Batangas Province, Luzon, last of natives relieved of all army surveillance April 16.

* * * * * * *

CHAFFEE.

So on the 16th day of April it had become unnecessary, because of the beneficial results of this policy, for the Army longer to hold the people of these infested provinces under surveillance, and the camps of concentration which had been established were broken up and the people were allowed to go to their homes, where they are to-day living in peace, while the war in the Philippines goes on in the Senate of the United States, but in no other place on the face of the earth.

Mr. President, when we have an official report showing the character of the camps established and showing that they were just such camps and that the people in them were accorded just such treatment as we might expect would be accorded by American officers and American soldiers to a helpless people of that character, it is not only without any warrant whatever, but absolutely inexcusable, and a slander on the American Army and the American people, for Senators to stand up here and say that the concentration camps we have established in the Philippines are to be likened to the concentration camps established by Weyler in Cuba. There is no comparison whatever.

The concentration camps in Cuba were established by Weyler for the express purpose, as all the world knows, of exterminating the population of the island of Cuba, while on the other hand the concentration camps in the Philippine Islands were established by the American Army for no other purpose than to give friendly protection to the people who were entitled to it, while the Army might, without injury to them, proceed against those who were in hostility to them as well as to us, and suppress an insurrection, without the suppression of which there could be no peace, no prosperity, and no civil government.

Mr. DIETRICH. Mr. President, I should like to add a little more testimony to that which has been quoted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] as to the contrast between reconcentration in the Philippine Islands and Weyler's reconcentration in Cuba. In the testimony of General Hughes he has the following to say:

I know it as it is practiced there—

That is, in the Philippine Islands—

I know it as it is practiced there. It is a misnomer to call it a policy of concentration, because the world has learned to put a significant meaning to that word. The policy as practiced in the Philippines has no element of cruelty in it. It is simply an order to the inhabitants of a particular locality to move from one portion to another, and there they reside and carry on their operations and business. If the locality into which they have moved does not afford them ample support, the United States Government provides them with food and shelter. The people are pleased with it, because they are permitted to lead an easy life, much easier than at home. There is no element of punishment or deprivation. They are simply requested to come into a certain district.

They are moved out of danger, then, for their own benefit?

Exactly; because those who are inclined to favor the Americans are assailed by the ladrones or the rebels, and unless they came within the lines of the American Army they would be compelled to pay tribute to the insurgents. These people largely accept this concentration, as it is practiced, as a relief instead of a punishment. It is a relief from a punishment inflicted upon them by the insurgents, with whom they have no sympathy.

I also wish to read a few lines from the testimony of Professor Barrows, who has been head of the bureau on uncivilized tribes.

Senator BEVERIDGE. You were pretty well over the island of Luzon, as I judge from your answers to questions, particularly in those provinces going northward from Manila to the north portion of the island. Did you observe in the prosecution of your work the operation at any point of the reconcentration policy, of which so much has been said? If you did, tell the committee what it was with reference to its cruelty or the reverse. Describe it.

Mr. BARROWS. I was in one province which was reconcentrado, and I think I visited all but one town in the province. I think the matter has been very greatly misunderstood. In this case the population was in no sense confined within barriers inimical to its well-being. There was no barbed-wire fence business at all. They were simply required to dwell and to work along a great cultivated stretch which made up the arable land of the province, within a certain distance of a military road that traversed it. They had to stay there. They could not go out to the mountains. They could not take to the woods. Of course within those limits they could pass, and pass for miles; harvest their rice, fish, do anything they wanted to do; but they must stay in the territory capable of patrol by the military forces.

Senator BEVERIDGE. But within those limits their personal action was free?

Mr. BARROWS. Yes, sir.

Senator DIETRICH. There was no starvation?

Mr. BARROWS. No, sir; that was impossible.

Senator BEVERIDGE. Did you observe any cruelties in those lines?

Mr. BARROWS. None whatever.

Senator BEVERIDGE. It is just as you have described it?

Mr. BARROWS. Yes, sir. For example, after the rice was cut they had to bring it in the vicinity of this military road and stack it there and thrash it there and harvest it there. They could not do as they had been doing—stack it way out in the country where the insurgents could come in and carry it off. It was simply a measure adopted to prevent the contribution to the insurgent cause of supplies and the rendering to it of assistance in many ways by a population that was supposedly and professedly peaceful.

I thought it would be well to add to the testimony and the reports of other officers these words from General Hughes and Professor Barrows.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not propose to-night to enter into a discussion of the point which has been discussed between the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER]. The Senator from Georgia, if I understand it, read a letter from an officer of high rank in the American Army, stating with great minuteness what he had personally seen. Now, unhappily——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT of Connecticut in the chair). Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I did not understand the Senator from Georgia to indicate the rank of the officer. He said he was a commissioned officer and a graduate of West Point. He did not say, so far as I remember, that he was an officer of high rank.

Mr. HOAR. I did not hear the statement on that particular point, but I understood he was said to be an officer of high rank.

Mr. ALLISON. He did not mention the rank.

Mr. HOAR. He did not mention the rank?

Mr. BACON. I will say he was not a subaltern.

Mr. FORAKER. Was he a field officer?

Mr. BACON. I have answered all I care to.

Mr. LODGE. I was not present when the letter was read. Was it anonymous?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. I was just about to state what would be an answer to that question.

Mr. FORAKER. I will state for the benefit of the junior Senator from Massachusetts, if the senior Senator from Massachusetts will allow me, that the Senator from Georgia read a letter in the course of his speech which he said he had received from an officer who was serving in the Philippines. He did not give the name, and he did not identify him in any manner except only to say that he was a graduate of West Point Military Academy.

Mr. HOAR. I am very happy to have the various Senators state how they understood it, but I was about to state how I understood it. I had better make my statement——

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Iowa prefers to proceed, he may go ahead.

Mr. ALLISON. I merely wanted to ask the Senator from Massachusetts to give us the date of the letter which the Senator from Georgia did not give, and also to state whether this officer is now serving in the Philippines. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to state that fact, which was not stated by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HOAR. I did not state that fact, so far as I remember.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I misunderstood the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. ALLISON. Now I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. HOAR. I am very happy to have the Senator from Iowa yield to me, considering the fact that I have the floor.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. I will go on and state what is my understanding, if I may.

I understand that the Senator from Georgia read a letter, wherein the writer described with some minuteness what he had personally seen, from an officer of high rank in the Army, personally known to him, and for whose high character as an officer and a gentleman he vouched. The Senator now says that the officer was not a subaltern, and whatever difference between those two statements there may be is proper for consideration. But everybody knows, and it is useless for anybody to disguise the fact, that it is very difficult indeed to get officers in the Regular Army to testify under their own names and openly to matters which reflect on the administration of a war. Brave men who will go up to the cannon's mouth for honor or for their country flinch from that. They are apt to fear that somehow or other promotion——

Mr. FORAKER rose.

Mr. HOAR. I wish I could make this statement. Still I will yield to the Senator.

Promotion is the object of their life. Honor is to them as the breath of their nostrils. Their power of taking care of those whom they have to take care of for life is affected. Now, that I believe—and I am making no criticism on the honor of American soldiers or sailors—to be the universal law of military life throughout all history.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator thinks he would like to have me interrupted——

Mr. FORAKER. I would be very much gratified if the Senator would yield to me just at that point.

Mr. HOAR. For what purpose?

Mr. FORAKER. I understood the Senator to say that it was difficult to have Army officers testify to anything that was in the nature of criticism. What I wanted to ask the Senator was whether he thought it was at all difficult for Army officers to state the truth in making official reports of facts ascertained.

Mr. HOAR. I am not dealing with that point now. I do not question the veracity of these gentlemen at all, but I am stating what I believe. It is just like in another way the propensity of Senators and Representatives—a propensity of which I am as thoroughly conscious and of which I have been charged all my life with carrying very far by people who have occasion to make political attacks on me—to stand by their own party in civil affairs.

Now, the Senate of the United States, I think unanimously, has ordered an investigation into the conduct of the war, and the investigation is apparently hardly over the threshold. I do not know how far it has gone, and I do not think it is quite fair to make impassioned and indignant claims that we must take the evidence of the persons under investigation as settling this question before we have gone any further. I think there is very grave matter proved already. I hope, and in regard to some matters I believe, that the prima facie evidence against the conduct of the war is to be rebutted. I have within four or five days, within ten days certainly, taken great personal pains to investigate two of the worst charges which have been made and which have been publicly believed to a large extent. In one of them I think the conduct of the war was completely vindicated and acquitted, and in the other—I shall speak of it next Thursday, if I am heard then—I am afraid in the other case the charge was established.

I do not propose to enter now upon a general discussion of a subject which I shall have something to say about in a day or two. I wish just to call attention to the point between the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Georgia as it has been left by the brilliant and impassioned speech of my honorable friend, always so brilliant and always so impassioned. He says that under this reconcentrado policy, or however you pronounce it (I have not been able to pronounce a Spanish word correctly since my honorable friend John Sherman, who used to tell us how to do it, left the Senate) they have been compelled to take people from their own homes over great districts of country, put them where they are under military power, where he says they are fed as well as any flock of lambs who are being prepared for the market in the spring are fed, and they are kept there.

Why? What is the object of this humane gathering together of a whole population from their homes and putting them under the military authority of a power 10,000 miles off? It is because some guerrillas or insurgents or men in arms are attacking those people and making their lives not only unhappy, but in great danger on account of the friendship of the people so selected to the United States. And it is a matter of humane and kindly protection that this is done.

Mr. President, we had a picture of the condition of things before we claimed our right to buy the sovereignty over that people or to get it as the spoils of battle or booty of war from Spain. Admiral Dewey sent out men who he says have given the best report of the condition of things in those interior districts, I dare say, the very districts to which this report refers, though I have not looked to see.

That was three years ago or thereabouts. The people were then living in peaceful and quiet villages, governing themselves, with their schools, and their libraries, and their kindly hospitality, and their musical instruments, and their Christian churches, and they were forty times as friendly to the United States as they are now, were they not? They received our people as a Newfoundland dog follows his master—with love and worship. There were not any guerrillas attacking them for that. They did not have to be protected against their own countrymen then. There was all the friendliness there and none of the danger from guerrillas.

Now, what has wrought the change? How does it happen that now men who are not so friendly as they used to be by a great deal can not live in peace in their homes because of guerrillas who attack them, because they are friendly to the United States? Who brought about that, I should like to know? It was brought about by that which brings it about everywhere on the face of the earth, which has brought it about, or something like it, from the beginning of time, and which will bring it about until time shall be no more, if the nature of man remains the same.

It was brought about by the fact that an alien government, without right and without justice and without title, has undertaken to deprive those men of the peaceful self-government which they were enjoying and to baffle and trample out the aspiration for their national independence which they had. This guerrilla warfare, the barbarity, so far as the people were partly savage, the civilized warfare so far as they were partly civilized, follows what we did when we attempted to impose our authority on that people by the inevitable law which God has planted in the heart of man, and which follows it as surely and as inevitably as the night follows the day.

I do not care whether the guerrilla began it or the man who administers the water torture began it. When you made that unfounded claim of sovereignty, if you heeded the warning of England in India, or of England in South Africa, or of human nature everywhere the round world over, you knew exactly that this condition of things would happen, and the reconcentration camp and the guerrilla and the danger and discomfort in their homes to that peaceful people, and barbarity on one side or the other, are the fruits of the tree you planted when you ratified the Spanish treaty.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, while the discussion of the pending bill has occasioned a great deal of debate the bill itself has been very little debated.

At the threshold of every disputed question there lies an initial fact and as to that fact there can be no halfway decision. The first thing for us to consider is whether to-day, without further ceremony, we will withdraw our troops from the Philippine Islands or whether we will remain there until American authority is recognized and peace is restored.

Now, there is no dodging that issue. You may talk about colonial policies; you may talk about the ultimate solution of this question; but to-day in the decision of this bill we have to decide whether we shall go on or whether we shall retreat. I do not believe that there are any considerable number of people in this country who want to beat a retreat. I shall do the Democratic party the credit of saying that in my humble judgment they believe, as we do, that the first thing to do is to establish the supremacy of the American Government in the Philippine Islands.

The gentleman who so eloquently addressed the Senate this afternoon [Mr. BACON] addressed this body only as late as last February, and in that speech he enunciated the Democratic doctrine as consisting of the proposition that the first thing for the Filipinos to do and that which would best serve the interests and the welfare of the Filipinos is to lay down their arms and recognize the American authority; and he declared that that was then Democratic doctrine.

Then I say with that at the threshold of this inquiry, the next question is, What shall be done with reference to the temporary government of those islands? At this point there is a difference of opinion. Some say that we ought to announce to those islands that when peace is restored, when American authority is recognized, they shall be independent.

But, Mr. President, we have before us to-day the mistakes that have been made in the last three years. When war broke out with Spain a declaration was made by Congress which has embarrassed us at every step of the solution of the Spanish problem. No sooner was war over with Spain than the claim was made that we were violating our plighted faith in not immediately and at once giving Cuba her independence, and we were embarrassed from that time on by the fact that we had made a legislative declaration prematurely. In the light of that experience is it not wise to wait until the development of time demonstrates what must be the ultimate outcome of the Philippine question?

Now, it is said that there is no occasion for legislation in regard to the Philippine Islands. I think there can be no question but what the resolution passed at the last session of Congress conferring power upon the President was no enlargement of his constitutional power. It seems to me that it is a wise proposition to get as rapidly as we can from the military to the civil arm, and by the enactment of a civil code in part by Congress and in part by the authority constituted by Congress in the Philippine Islands to teach those people that we are as rapidly as we can getting away from the military arm and approaching the civil.

Now, there is another proposition to be stated. If the Cuban Republic proves a success it will be largely due to the fact that for three years she had the guiding protection of a nation which has been drilled and schooled to government. It seems to me that it would be absurd to suppose for one moment that to-day the Filipinos are capable of governing themselves. But this bill by a gradual process places in the hands of the Filipinos an ever-extending self-government as they develop their capacity for that purpose.

Objection is made that the bill leaves the status of the Filipino undefined. Of course, we must all recognize the fact that in the breast of the Filipino, as in the breast of the Anglo-Saxon, there is an inborn desire to rule and regulate; but we say in all candor to the Filipino, in view of the sacrifice that we have made, in view of the cost of blood and treasure in the securing to the Filipino that which he enjoys to-day, he might well content himself in patience for a little while as long as we bear a larger proportion of the burden than he does. When we look back and reflect that only a few years ago the hateful and palsied hand of Spain rested on those islands, when we realize that for three centuries the Filipino had no participation in government, it seems to me that he might well be asked to restrain his patience for a little time while we, bearing the heavier part of the burden, solve that part of this problem which devolves upon us.

Mr. President, the Filipino is an incident in this problem. If we fail in finally bringing salvation to the Philippine Islands it means loss and failure to human history. On the other hand, if this Republic of ours works out the problem wisely, judiciously, and successfully, it is a contribution to the cause of human progress worth more in the end than the welfare of any one people, whoever the people may be.

I say, then, in dealing with this question, while we must not lose sight of the Filipino, we can not lose sight of the obligation which rests upon us, and we must ask the Filipino to wait with patience until the time comes when other promises and other conditions may be his lot and his fortune.

Mr. President, this debate has presented a strange spectacle. It presented a most strange spectacle this afternoon, in keeping with the character of the debate from its very inception. When the debate commenced we began to be regaled with stories of atrocities of American soldiers. The horrors of all history were paraded, and in all history no parallel found to the atrocious conduct of the American soldiers in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. President, there is a law of nature recognized in the administration of human law, and that is that there is a cause for every human action. That cause may be simply a cause; it may be a palliation; it may be an excuse; it may amount to an absolute justification.

Why, then, were Senators so swift to present the character of the atrocities committed by the American soldier and so slow to present the cause for whatever that cause might be worth?

We have been practically told in this debate that it made no difference; in other words, when a man is charged with an offense the fact is proved, and when he begins to present the evidence of the conditions surrounding that act he is told that that is immaterial. Already they rely upon the presumption—and if they did it was a safe presumption—that in the American people and in the Republican party there would come a swift vindication, not in the performance of a duty, but in the exercise of a great privilege.

Again this afternoon we witnessed the same spectacle. We are told of these camps, and yet the evidence from which all the stories of those camps is taken contains the orders, the story of the condition of those camps, the justification for their existence, if it is a justification, a cause if it is only a cause.

During the early part of the debate we were informed that the half had not been told, and some who did not have time day by day to read the proceedings of the committee sat in breathless alarm waiting for the other half to be told. It was told one day when the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] gave the other half of the story; and from that moment there came up a muttering of disapproval by the people of this country for the unwarranted attack upon the Army until the men who had made that attack shifted their base and said that it was not a question of responsibility with the soldier, but the responsibility rested upon the Senator from Massachusetts and the Republican Senators of this body.

Yesterday we listened to a most eloquent address from the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER], and, while we could say "amen" to all that he said, with all due deference to him, with all due respect for him, I propose to go one step further in the discussion of the question of responsibility. All human nature demonstrates the truth that while individuals may be considered as factors in history the fact is that as a rule they are nothing more nor less than instruments. It has been said by some that our career which ended in our getting in the Philippine Islands was destiny. It has been said by others that it was the act of God himself. If we adhere to the maxim, vox populi, vox Dei, then it was the voice of God, for it was the voice of the American people.

I would detract nothing from the credit that is due to William McKinley, but from the time some dastard hand fired the Maine in the harbor of Habana and hurled American seamen into eternity, neither McKinley nor any other man was great enough to stay the course and progress of events in this country. War was then as inevitable as the ebb and flow of the ocean's tide. Much as he regretted it, much as he deplored it, it would have been impossible for him or anyone else to have prevented it.

I would detract nothing from the credit due to the men who signed the treaty of peace in Paris. They were presented to us yesterday as men of standing, of patriotism, of learning, and of courage. It is true that that commission had it in their power to deal with the details of the treaty, but that commission, when we take into consideration the force of a developed public sentiment, was powerless to bring about any other result than the expulsion of Spain from those islands and the retention of the islands by the United States until in the process of time an ultimate determination as to the islands themselves could be arrived at.

That commission, I say, recognizing this power as the force of public sentiment, was powerless to have reached any other conclusion.

About the time that the treaty of peace was signed an event occurred in the Philippine Islands. It may be difficult to fix just where the responsibility was for the conflict that broke out between the followers of Aguinaldo and the American soldiers; but wherever that responsibility lay, whichever side inaugurated that conflict, the greatest power and the wisest judgment on earth—for the wisest judgment on earth is the deliberate judgment of the American people—pronounced a verdict as to what should be done in view of the conditions that arose from that outbreak, and at the last Presidential election, in no unmeaning terms, they pronounced their verdict as to the condition then confronting us—that the policy of the American people in the restoration of peace and in the establishment of the national authority in those islands should go on until they were both accomplished.

Then, I say, if you want to fix the responsibility for our being in the Philippine Islands to-day, you have got to fix it upon the American people. From start to finish, from the day when the Maine was blown up until to-day, there has been no time when the men who assumed to shape and mold public affairs could have abandoned the general policy which has been pursued with reference to those islands.

But, Mr. President, there is another responsibility. We have just listened to the eloquent senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR]. He has asked us how it is that at one time the Filipino was a friend, and how it is that to-day we find him in arms against our Government. With all due respect to the distinguished Senator, let me remind this body that there is a reason for that change. If the words of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], thundered into the ears of the Filipinos in 1901, had been continuously echoed down to this day, peace would have been established in the Philippine Islands.

It was my fortune to enter this Senate one afternoon in January, 1901, and to listen for a few moments to the gentleman who temporarily preceded me in this body. He spoke in eulogy of Aguinaldo, comparing Aguinaldo, if I remember correctly, to Washington himself.

That is not all. There has been thundering into the ears of the Filipinos, from the time the controversy began down to within five minutes of this moment, the threat and the prophecy that in the end the Filipino is doomed to be enslaved by the American people. If it is desired that peace shall come to the Philippine Islands, if it is desired that American authority shall be established in the Philippine Islands, it would rather be the part of wisdom if not of patriotism to cease dinning into the ears of the Filipinos that they stand in danger of being ultimately enslaved by the American nation.

Mr. President, there is nothing in the history of this nation to warrant that threat or to warrant that prophecy. Instead of holding up to the Filipino the danger that some day he will be the slave of this Government, how much better, how much wiser, how much more patriotic, how much more true to the history of our own people, would it be to point the Filipino to the history of our nation in dealing with this great problem of liberty. Our first struggle was a struggle for liberty; then there was our great struggle with ourselves in the great civil war. When in the annals of history was a conquered people treated with more generosity than on the occasion of the conclusion of that war? Is there anything in the conduct of the American people at the close of that struggle upon which to predicate the threat or the prophecy that the American people have in their hearts a desire and a purpose to enslave a people, to enslave a nation?

Ah, Mr. President, but there is another picture that we might with profit hold up day after day and night after night to the gaze of the Filipino as a suggestion to him that in the patience required for the solution of this problem he must have faith and confidence in the American people. A few years ago the people of this country, reaching a degree of impatience where they could hardly be restrained, were finally precipitated into a war with Spain. It would have been no trouble at all to have acquired Cuba and annexed it to our own country. But what did we do? Did we enslave Cuba? No; we not only lifted from Cuba the dark and heavy weight of Spanish misrule, but we threw around that island our great, strong arm, and while in the path of peace and the methods of orderly administration the people of that island were enabled to form their own government, and to-day Cuba stands out among the nations of this earth; and there is no one on this earth to-day more glad that Cuba has been born among the nations of the world than are the American people.

It is a travesty upon history, it is unfair to the history of the American people, to hold dangling forever before the Filipinos the picture of an enslaved people. Our history does not warrant it. On the other hand, we should hold before them the picture of our achievements and what we have done in the cause of human liberty. Instead of encouraging them constantly by the threat of colonization and the threat of enslavement, let us lead them to believe that in the patience required they must have faith and confidence in a nation that never has given token of anything but the most kind and generous treatment of every foe, great or small. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

A bill (H. R. 2857) granting an increase of pension to Frances J. Haughton;

A bill (H. R. 6625) granting an increase of pension to Mary P. Downing;

A bill (H. R. 7397) granting a pension to Louisa White; and

A bill (H. R. 9606) granting an increase of pension to Charles Litz.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10782) granting a pension to Ole Steensland.

The message further announced that the House had passed with amendments the bill (S. 593) for the establishment, control, operation, and maintenance of the Northern Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Hot Springs, in the State of South Dakota; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HULL, Mr. CAPRON, and Mr. HAY managers at the conference on the part of the House, with instructions not to agree to the amendments of the Senate numbered 13, 14, and 15 to the bill, relating to the construction of permanent buildings at established military posts, except as authorized by section 1136 of the Revised Statutes.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9544) granting an increase of pension to George W. Barry, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SULLOWAY, Mr. KLEBERG, and Mr. GIBSON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8794) granting an increase of pension to Henry I. Smith, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. RUMPLE, Mr. DEEMER, and Mr. MIERS of Indiana managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 4103) granting a pension to William C. Hickcox, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SULLOWAY, Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, and Mr. NORTON managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message further announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8840) granting an increase of pension to John H. Lauchey; asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GIBSON, Mr. KLEBERG, and Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10545) granting an increase of pension to Solomon P. Brockway, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GIBSON, Mr. DARRAGH, and Mr. MIERS of Indiana managers at the conference on the part of the House.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 14046) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. SPOONER. Pending that motion, I wish to ask, Mr. President, if all the messages from the House of Representatives have been laid before the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. I will withdraw my motion for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is the action of the House of Representatives on the bill making appropriations for the support of the Army, but the Senator who reported the bill and who had charge of it is not present in the Senate. The Chair understands he will be here to-morrow morning.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not wish to call the bill up to-day, but I should like to have the message from the House of Representatives read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 20, 1902.

Resolved, That the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. HULL, Mr. CAPRON, and Mr. HAY be the managers of the conference on the part of the House, with the following instructions:

Whereas Senate amendments numbered 13, 14, and 15 to the bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year 1903 makes the proposed appropriation of $4,000,000 for barracks and quarters available for the construction of such permanent buildings at established military posts as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, and reappropriates from unexpended balances of former appropriations for barracks and quarters $350,000 for construction of necessary garrison buildings, notwithstanding appropriations for said objects are made, in accordance with the rules and practice of the House, in the sundry civil appropriation bill for said year; and

Whereas said amendments are subversive of the rules of the House, duplicate appropriations, and tend to confusion in the methods of making appropriations for the support of the Government, and will, if agreed to, give rise to a practice that will inevitably result in extravagant and wasteful expenditures: Therefore,

Resolved, That the managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 12804 are instructed not to recommend an agreement to said amendments Nos. 13, 14, and 15, or to any modification thereof that will, under authority of said Army appropriation act, permit the expenditure of any sum for construction of permanent buildings at established military posts, except as authorized by section 1136 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. SPOONER. I only wanted that message read, so that it might appear in the RECORD.

Mr. SCOTT. I hope that the subject will go over until the chairman of the committee is here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message will lie on the table until to-morrow, unless some motion is made in regard to it.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not wish to make a motion on this subject, but I should like to say that I think we ought to have from some competent committee—from the Committee on Rules or the Committee on Appropriations, who have such great experience on this question—some carefully considered report, which would instruct the Senate as to the proper proceeding in these matters. Questions of this character are apt to come in at the close of the session, when we are all anxious to adjourn or anxious to dispatch business, and we can not deal with them carefully and deliberately.

Without making a motion now, I should like to suggest to the Senators who have these matters especially in charge that we ought to have a pretty carefully considered statement of the limitations under which the two Houses shall proceed in this matter of conference.

I thought the other day that instructions of this kind prevented the conferees from having a free conference, but the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] made a very instructive and suggestive statement about it, which rather led me to modify the opinion which I had previously expressed in regard to that particular report; but it is obvious that we can not transact business with comfort and with due self-respect by sending our conferees absolutely untrammeled on the one side to meet gentlemen on the other side who have such instructions as these.

The object of a conference committee is to have each House hear the reasons of the other, communicated by the committee on the one side and reported to the House by its own committee on the other. Now, we appoint such a committee, and we are informed that the other branch says to its conferees: "Do not you listen to anything they say to you; do not agree to anything, and do not ask us to do so." It is a very strange attitude we are getting into.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Massachusetts that he expressed during the last Congress the same view that he now expresses. He then introduced a resolution instructing the Committee on Appropriations to make such an inquiry as that which he has just stated. The inquiry was carefully made by the committee, through our very competent clerk, Mr. Cleaves, who hunted up all the precedents, and I was ready to make a report at the close of the last Congress, but in the hurry of the closing hours I did not get it in. So a few days ago I made a report on the subject, which is now in print in Document No. 1545.

I think this is a very important question, both as respects the honor and dignity of the Senate and the proper consideration of these great public measures, which must pass during every session of Congress.

I shall be very glad if the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] will allow this matter to lie over. This particular bill is in charge of the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR]. I hope this question, which we all agree is a very important one, will lie over until he appears in his seat. He has not been here to-day, and I am not sure that he is in the building at this time.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, I merely asked for the reading of the message. I am not a member of the committee having the bill in charge, and I had no thought whatever of asking the Senate to act upon it now.

Mr. ALLISON. I understand that.

Mr. SPOONER. But I desired to have the message read, so that it might be embodied in the RECORD, in order that Senators might read it.

I do not know what the practice has been hitherto. I am not very much of a parliamentarian, and I do not know what is in the report of the Committee on Appropriations, to which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has referred, but it is a very extraordinary proposition to me that the House of Representatives should send us a message requesting us to grant a free conference upon a bill, accompanied by instructions to their conferees not to enter into a full and free conference. If they can do that as to one amendment, they can do it as to every amendment which the Senate has adopted. The suggestion contained in that message that we are to legislate here with reference to the rules of the House is one that is rather startling.

Mr. HOAR. May I call the Senator's attention to one proposition which is laid down in the report to which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] has just alluded?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. It is paragraph No. 55.

Mr. SPOONER. On what page?

Mr. HOAR. Page 20, paragraph 55:

It is in order in the Senate to recommit a conference report to a committee on conference, but not with instructions.

Now, then, we bind ourselves in this way; we can not instruct our conferees; and it leaves us in a peculiar position.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not now express any opinion upon this subject except the opinion that it ought to be postponed. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] that it is an important question.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not express any opinion on the subject, except that it does seem strange, and it will be impossible, if this proposition be carried to its logical result, that we can transact business. I have always been very anxious and very careful about any reference to the House of Representatives; but it is, of course, of vital importance to the people that we should cooperate, each branch with the other, and arrange all these matters without the slightest friction.

The other day the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] was very confident that there would not be a repetition of such a message as that which has come to us again to-day. I think it important, just as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] thinks it important, that we should take this matter up and consider it carefully.

Mr. CULLOM. It is a little bit surprising that so soon after the other instructions from the House of Representatives to its conference committee there should follow another apparently more specific than the first. It seems to me, if the Senate has any rights at all, we had better assert them at once.

Mr. FORAKER. I should like to inquire of some of the older Senators, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON], or the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], how long the Senate has had the benefit of instructions of this character from the other House? Is this a practice of antiquity?

Mr. TELLER. It is a practice of about three days.

Mr. LODGE. Of about a week, apparently.

Mr. CARMACK. It would be well if we could have some assurance from the House of Representatives that there will be no further repetition of it.

Mr. TELLER. This is the second time within a week.

Mr. FORAKER. This is the second time only, I understand, that it has been done.

Mr. CULLOM. The second time at this session.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I now renew my motion——

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to make an announcement.

Mr. LODGE. Very well. I yield to the Senator for that purpose.

Mr. FORAKER. I wish to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] who has the Army appropriation bill in charge will, he informed me, be in his seat to-morrow morning, and then the matter can be taken up and we can learn to what extent we are to benefit by the instructions of the House of Representatives.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I now renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 34 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, May 21, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 20, 1902.

ASSISTANT TREASURER.

Julius Jacobs, of California, to be assistant treasurer of the United States at San Francisco, Cal. (Reappointment.)

ASSISTANT AGENT OF SALMON FISHERIES.

John J. Coyle, of Pennsylvania, to be assistant agent at the salmon fisheries of Alaska, to succeed A. D. Harlan, resigned.

MARSHALS.

William M. Hanson, of Texas, to be United States marshal for the southern district of Texas, commencing July 1, 1902. An original appointment, as provided in the act approved March 11, 1902, entitled "An act to divide the State of Texas in four judicial districts."

Andrew J. Houston, of Texas, to be United States marshal for the eastern district of Texas, vice John Grant, removed.

CONFIRMATIONS.

Executive nominations confirmed by the Senate May 20, 1902.

ENVOY EXTRAORDINARY AND MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY.

Herbert Goldsmith Squiers, of New York, to be envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States to the Republic of Cuba.

ASSISTANT AGENT OF FISHERIES OF ALASKA.

John J. Coyle, of Pennsylvania, to be assistant agent at the salmon fisheries of Alaska.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, May 20, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the conference report on the bill H. R. 8587, for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies, reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act. And I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the report be omitted and that the statement be read.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If the report is not long I would like to have it read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee demands that both be read. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the conference report, which will be found in the Senate proceedings of May 19, on page 6053 of the RECORD.

The Clerk read the statement, as follows:

Statement to accompany conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8587) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act.

The bill as it passed the House provided for the payment of claims recommended by the Court of Claims under the terms of the Bowman Act, and carried an appropriation of $213,105.67.

The Senate amended the title by adding at the end of same the words "and for other purposes" (amendment numbered 2) and struck out all after the enacting clause (amendment numbered 1), and inserted in lieu thereof certain claims certified from the Court of Claims under the provisions of the Bowman and Tucker acts.

The bill as it passed the Senate contained:

Bowman and Tucker act claims amounting to	$502,759.10
French spoliation claims	799,675.88
Selfridge board claims	1,072,424.30
Churches and colleges	62,974.96
State claims	472,241.98
Miscellaneous claims	232,281.29
Total direct appropriation	3,142,357.60

The Selfridge board claims were stricken from the bill in conference.

The claims of the States of California and Oregon were stricken from the bill in conference for the reason that these claims were referred to the Treasury Department for investigation and settlement by a provision in an urgent deficiency bill approved February 14, 1902. The claim of the State of Nevada was stricken from the bill and a clause inserted in lieu thereof sending the claim to the Treasury Department for investigation and settlement, as in the cases of California, Oregon, and other States.

The bill as agreed to in conference carries a direct appropriation of $1,618,498.86. The Senate receded from $1,553,172.74.

The Senate struck out of the bill as it passed the House seven claims. Three have been restored to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. MAHON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to was laid on the table.

URGENT DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. CANNON. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations, I report the urgent deficiency bill which I send to the desk. I ask that it be read, and request unanimous consent for its immediate consideration in the House.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14589) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902.

Be it enacted, etc., That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to supply deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year 1902, namely:

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE.

United States courts: For fees of jurors, $25,000.

For payment of such miscellaneous expenses as may be authorized by the Attorney-General for the United States courts and their offices, including the arranging and collecting of evidence where the United States is or may be a party in interest, and removing of records, $35,000.

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

For necessary traveling expenses, including those of examiners acting under the direction of the Civil Service Commission, and for expenses of examinations and investigations held elsewhere than at Washington, $1,000.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, $20,000.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman—repeating the question which I put to him last week—whether we are to have a deficiency bill every week of this session? I suppose that we may safely assume that if this thing is to be kept up we shall have no general deficiency bill, but that all the deficiencies are to be taken care of in these urgent bills.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the question of the gentleman I will say we passed an urgent deficiency bill——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Will the gentleman tell us how many of these bills have been passed in this Congress?

Mr. CANNON. In a moment. We passed an urgent deficiency bill in January, which carried, in round numbers, $20,000,000. It was supposed at the time that that would be the principal deficiency bill, apart from the general deficiency bill, the intention being, later on, just at the close of the fiscal year, to bring in the ordinary general deficiency bill.

Now, at the time the first bill of this character was passed, we supposed we had included what was necessary; but from time to time, from the House and from the Senate, on account of contingent expenses, and from the several departments, on account of printing and other expenses absolutely necessary, if the business of the country was to continue, we have been notified of urgent items, and we have appropriated for them. In this case it will be necessary for the courts of the United States to shut up if we do not give the $25,000 here proposed to be appropriated for juries.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. May I ask the gentleman why was not that put in the regulation appropriation bill? Why is it necessary that we should have these repeated urgent deficiency bills? We had an urgent deficiency bill in the beginning of this session——

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We had another urgent deficiency bill—No. 2—which came here about the 3d of April.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Then, later, we had an urgent deficiency bill No. 3; and now comes urgent deficiency bill No. 4.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, how many more of these bills are we to have? And let me ask the gentleman why it was not possible to provide for these appropriations at the regular time?

Mr. CANNON. I trust that we shall have but one more bill of this character. It is possible, however, that before the general deficiency bill is reported some item may come up that may render it necessary for carrying on the public service that something like this be provided for.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. One more question, if the gentleman will permit me. Has he, in all his experience, ever known so many urgent deficiency bills as we have had presented to us at this session—at one session of Congress?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, this is not at all out of the ordinary course.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Does the gentleman think we have ever had urgent deficiency bill No. 4 by the 20th of May in a regular session of Congress?

Mr. CANNON. Yes, sir. [After a pause.] After verifying my recollection, yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Well, I have very great faith in the source from which the gentleman "refreshed his recollection." [Laughter.]

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CANNON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back the bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriations for the support of the Army, with Senate amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments all be disagreed to, and asking for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, by direction of his committee, reports back the military appropriation bill, being directed by that committee to ask disagreement to all the Senate amendments, asking for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I do not see on this side any members of that committee present.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that it is simply to nonconcur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is to nonconcur in all the amendments?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered; and the Chair announces the following conferees on the part of the House——

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, pending that I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. In this connection the gentleman from Illinois offers the following resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Senate amendments numbered 13, 14, and 15 to the bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year 1903, makes the proposed appropriation of $4,000,000 for barracks and quarters available for the construction of such permanent buildings at established military posts as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, and reappropriates from unexpended balances of former appropriations for barracks and quarters $350,000 for construction of necessary garrison buildings, notwithstanding appropriations for said objects are made, in accordance with the rules and practice of the House, in the sundry civil appropriation bill for said year; and

Whereas said amendments are subversive of the rules of the House, duplicate appropriations, and tend to confusion in the methods of making appropriations for the support of the Government, and will, if agreed to, give rise to a practice that will inevitably result in extravagant and wasteful expenditures: Therefore,

Resolved, That the managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 12804 are instructed not to recommend an agreement to said amendments numbered 13, 14, and 15, or to any modification thereof that will, under authority of said Army appropriation act, permit the expenditure of any sum for construction of permanent buildings at established military posts, except as authorized by section 1136 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. CANNON rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman wishes to discuss his resolution, yes; but I shall oppose his instructions, Mr. Speaker. Does the gentleman desire to say anything?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. HULL. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. CANNON. Well, I can not tell. I do not want any undue time, but I want time enough to put the House in possession of the resolution which I want to ask it to adopt.

Mr. HULL. Well, we have an hour. How much does the gentleman think he ought to have?

Mr. CANNON. I do not think I want but a few minutes.

Mr. HULL. Ten minutes?

Mr. CANNON. Possibly I can get through in ten minutes. I may, after I hear my friend, want ten minutes more. I do not know.

Mr. HULL. Very likely. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for ten minutes on his resolution.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, this is a matter of some importance touching the orderly procedure, jurisdiction of committees as to appropriations, and I desire very briefly the attention of the House while I speak to the resolution. There are certain things that I apprehend the gentleman from Iowa and myself will not disagree about. One is that the estimates for barracks and quarters, repairs of same, and construction of buildings, not to exceed $20,000 in cost at existing posts, have always, under the rules of the House, been referred to and recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs; that the estimates for constructions, for buildings at and enlargement of military posts, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, have always been referred to the Committee on Appropriations and appropriated for on the sundry civil bill. I pause for a contradiction, if there is to be any disagreement as to the facts. Now, section 1136 of the Revised Statutes is as follows:

Permanent barracks or quarters and buildings and structures of a permanent nature shall not be constructed unless detailed estimates shall have been previously submitted to Congress and approved by a special appropriation for the same.

Except when constructed by troops.

Now, what are the facts? The Secretary of the Treasury, in transmitting the estimates for permanent improvements, barracks and quarters, and military posts, transmitted them to Congress and asked $2,000,000. That was referred to the Committee on Appropriations. The sundry civil bill carried an appropriation of a million and a half as it passed the House. It went to the Senate. The Senate increased the amount by $300,000, and the matter is now in conference. The Secretary of War forwarded his estimates for repairs, such as went to the Committee on Military Affairs—the usual estimate—and asked $3,000,000. The House Committee on Military Affairs recommended the $3,000,000. It passed the House and went to the Senate. Thus far the matter has proceeded under the rules of the House.

For temporary repairs and buildings under $20,000 the Committee on Military Affairs recommended the whole amount. For the permanent improvements the Committee on Appropriations recommended $500,000 less than was estimated for, which was amended by the Senate, as I have indicated, increasing it $300,000.

The procedure up to this point was known, and was along the line of the rules of the House and the practice that has existed for a generation. Now, the Army bill was taken up in the Senate, and they offer the following amendment, and pass it, and send it to the House. Listen. As it passed the House it was as follows:

Barracks and quarters: For barracks and quarters for troops, storehouses for the safe-keeping of military stores, for offices, recruiting stations, and for the hire of buildings and grounds for summer cantonments, and for temporary buildings at frontier stations, for the construction of temporary buildings and stables, and for repairing public buildings at established posts.

I have read the House provision. Now, the Senate struck out, in lines 15, 16, 17, and 18, the words:

Temporary buildings at frontier stations, for the construction of temporary buildings and stables, and for repairing public buildings at established posts.

And inserted the following words:

The construction and repair of such permanent or temporary buildings at established posts as the Secretary of War may deem necessary.

In other words, by that language they make it all that the Army bill usually carries, and make it for every purpose that the sundry civil bill under the rules of the House has heretofore always carried. Not content with that, they increase the appropriation by $1,350,000. Now, mind you, the estimate upon which this bill passed the House was $3,000,000. The House gave $3,000,000, and that was all that was ever asked for by the Secretary of War. The Senate amendment accepts the $3,000,000, enlarges the purpose for which it was appropriated, and recommends $4,350,000, or $1,350,000 that the Secretary of War and the Executive never estimated for.

Now, what have we? One great committee of this House recommending permanent improvements under the rules for a miliion and a half dollars. Another great committee of the House is asked under this amendment to make the Army bill appropriation precisely like the sundry civil bill appropriation. In other words, both bills treat the same subject-matter and appropriate for the same purpose against the rules of the House, duplicating appropriations and increasing the amount $1,350,000 more than the Executive has estimated for.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, has there been any precedent for such practices as that heretofore?

Mr. CANNON. No; it is without precedent.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. How does it happen at this time that this precedent is attempted to be established?

Mr. CANNON. Speaking respectfully of another body, it is perfectly patent at this session of Congress, and for many sessions of Congress, in my judgment, that this House, coming from the people, in close touch with the people, in nine cases out of ten has to be the conservative body and to protect the Treasury.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. How much is added to the bill without proper estimates?

Mr. CANNON. One million three hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. That is not done in this body, as I understand.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, no; I am trying to keep it from being done in this body.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennesse. I understand.

Mr. CANNON. By expressing the sense of this House that it ought not to be done.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, is it too late for a point of order to accomplish that purpose?

Mr. CANNON. A point of order, I will say to my friend, would not be effective at this stage, because this is a Senate amendment, and would not go out upon a point of order.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I recognize that fact, and having great confidence and faith in the ability of the gentleman, will he tell us how we can avail ourselves of an opportunity to correct this error?

Mr. CANNON. I know of no way but for the House in good temper, but with great firmness, to express its opinion by this instruction to the conferees who represent the House, that the law is not to be changed.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Now, one other question. Does the gentleman anticipate that our conferees will object to such instruction?

Mr. HULL. Yes. He has a right to.

Mr. CANNON. Well, the gentleman in charge of the bill says "Yes;" and, reading between the lines, I am satisfied that the Committee on Military Affairs ought to be informed by a majority vote of this House that this practice will not be permitted. I speak in perfectly cool temper about the matter. And having said that much, I will yield the floor.

Mr. SNODGRASS rose.

Mr. CANNON. Does the gentleman want to ask me a question?

Mr. SNODGRASS. Yes. The Committee on Military Affairs having disagreed to the Senate amendment, does not the gentleman think that they can be trusted as conferees by this House without passing a resolution of this nature, practically suggesting in advance they are not to be trusted?

Mr. CANNON. This is the orderly procedure of the House. It is perfectly parliamentary. It is quite customary in this and former Congresses to take this course. In my judgment, the Committee on Military Affairs by its own motion ought to have invited this action. But I think it is proper for me to say that the chairman of the committee, in talking with him, informed me that his committee had instructed him to resist a motion of this kind. Well, now, here is the issue, and the House will have it to settle.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman yield to another question?

Mr. CANNON. Certainly.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Does he not think it would have been ridiculous on the part of the conferees to come in here and ask the House to instruct them not to agree?

Mr. CANNON. Possibly so, and possibly not; but let me say to my friend that it is perfectly competent that where it is to be about a matter of difference, the manly way, in due courtesy and without feeling, is to settle the matter by calling the attention of the House to it and let the House determine it.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I disagree with the gentleman from Illinois as to this being the ordinary way of going into conference. I think the ordinary way is for the conferees to be appointed, and for them to come before the House with their report, and not to have lectures read to the conferees in advance. The challenge of the gentleman from Illinois as to the action of the Senate requires no answer on my part, because it is a comparatively everyday occurrence for the Senate to put amendments on bills that the House can not put on, amendments contrary to the rules of the House; but it does seem to me his action and contention this morning is ill-timed and out of place. The Committee on Military Affairs took this matter up and considered it in the committee, and with a good many of the amendments we were willing to agree; the larger number of Senate amendments the committee was perfectly willing to agree to, but some of these amendments, including those mentioned by the gentleman from Illinois, we were not willing to agree to at that time.

Part of these amendments that he refers to the conference committee may bring in an agreement on; others they would disagree on. But the views of the committee were, in order to have a full and free conference, and that we might have something to go into the conference on, as all you gentlemen understand who have been on conference committees, to have some trading stock, to give and take on, we disagreed to all of them. Now, after this committee brings in a report, then the sentiment of the House would be tested; but it seems to me ill-timed for us in the House to pass resolutions upon matters that are referred to the conference committee. I can not believe that the gentleman from Illinois regarded it as so absolutely necessary for him at this time to bring in the resolution unless it was that he feared that we might disagree entirely, and thus deprive him of the opportunity to deliver a very fine speech on the floor of this House and lecture the members.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will allow me just at this point. I would not have done it if my friend had not informed me that his committee was for this amendment.

Mr. HULL. No. I do not want the gentleman to misunderstand me, and I know he would not misstate what I said.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not want to interfere with the gentleman, but I understood the gentleman to say that a moment ago when I interrogated the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HULL. To a large part of this amendment the committee had by a direct vote said they would not agree to it; to other parts they did not so express themselves, and I could not speak for the committee, but the committee had instructed me to report the bill to the House, to disagree to all of them. Further than this, I may say for myself, I can go into the private conversation had with the gentleman from Illinois and submit it to the House if necessary.

Mr. CANNON. If my friend will allow me. Let us have no misunderstanding.

Mr. HULL. That is right.

Mr. CANNON. The three matters that I propose to ask the House to instruct on are the matters that are referred to. There are three matters in these amendments that I do not ask instructions on. Now, then, I will ask my friend right now if his committee is not in favor of this change of language?

Mr. HULL. I do not know.

Mr. CANNON. And if he himself is not in favor of this change of language?

Mr. HULL. So far as I am concerned, I stated in the committee room in talking to the gentleman that unless the language is changed there is no excuse for the additional amount being put in the bill. The limitation of $20,000 was placed in the law, I think, first in 1859, and in the seventies amended.

The demands of the country were entirely different from what they are to-day. There is no question, gentlemen of the House, but what the Committee on Military Affairs and the Committee on Appropriations have a little clash of jurisdiction on many matters. Take an instance. The rules of this House give the Committee on Military Affairs, absolute jurisdiction over every appropriation connected with the line of the Army, and yet there is constant friction as it applies to the artillery; and the rules of this House have been set aside by the Committee of the Whole House, where it provides specifically for jurisdiction for the Committee on Military Affairs, and has allowed the Committee on Appropriations to carry it. I do not deny that I believe it would be better if we were to remove the restriction of $20,000, because of the changed conditions that have come in the last forty years in this country. But whether it is true or not, whether the committee of conference will agree to that or not, whether they will agree to any of these propositions or not, first have the committee make its report, and then let it be challenged in this House. It does seem to me that this resolution now is ill timed and out of place, and the time for this test to be made is after we have had one conference.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I would like to ask whether or not the Senate put in an amendment to the bill permitting the Secretary of War to lease certain grazing land in Oklahoma, known as the Fort Hill Reservation?

Mr. HULL. No.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I want to say that this is an unprecedented resolution, to instruct conferees before there has been any conference. Now, no one can be injured, nor can any jurisdiction be taken away from the great Committee on Appropriations unless it is the will of the House after the conferees return here with their report. Then if it is the sense of the House to instruct the conferees not to agree to these amendments of the Senate, it can be done; but to violate now the rules of the House, not only of this House but of the two Houses, to violate the precedents which obtain, it seems to me would be most remarkable, and the effort on the part of the gentleman from Illinois to bind our hands, or the hands of the conferees in this conference, is to leave us without any discretion whatever.

I do not think that the members on this side of the House should heed the remark of the gentleman from Tennessee, that we ought to support the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, until the House has had an opportunity to receive the report of the conferees. We are now asking not to concur, and the House has refused to concur in these very amendments. What more can they ask? If we do not do our duty in the opinion of the House, then the House will have an opportunity to instruct us what our duty is, and of course the conferees will obey the instructions of the House.

Mr. HULL. I will now yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, the principle involved in the decision of this matter goes very far beyond the question arising upon this particular bill. The House passes a bill; the Senate, for reasons known to itself, makes amendments to that bill. The House disagrees to those amendments. They then ask for a conference. For what purpose is a full and free conference between these two Houses asked? Manifestly that by meeting the members of the Senate the House may inquire, as is right, as is courteous, why those amendments were put in, and find out the reasons that urged the Senate to make them. Until that is done we can not know those reasons that influence a coordinate body.

But to pass a resolution that, before knowing or asking for those reasons, we should tell our conferees that no matter what these reasons may be we will not concur is not, in my opinion, conducive to good legislation, because all good legislation depends upon courtesy. It is a statement, not after inquiry, but before, that no matter what is urged by the Senate we will have nothing to do with what they propose.

Now, I do not expect to be upon this conference committee and I do not have anything to do with the conference, but I may say on the floor of this House that the question of barracks and quarters, when we are establishing new posts or moving posts or changing posts where we can get a healthy place for our soldiers to live, is not a question that under all circumstances ought to be controlled by section 1136.

I am astonished that the gentleman from Illinois thinks that the statute passed in 1859 for an army of 10,000 men might certainly and under all circumstances be applicable to our present Army.

Section 1136 says that barracks and quarters for our troops in the Philippines shall not be established until the detailed estimates, including and stating the particular place, have first been submitted to Congress. It may be a necessity to move troops,

This section provides also that the estimate must first be submitted by the Secretary of War, approved by Congress, and an appropriation made by Congress for that purpose. There may be a need to move and give permanent quarters instantly, and to buy land therefor. The section provides that no building, the cost of which shall exceed $20,000, shall be erected except by special authority of Congress. Meanwhile, the cost of building has so advanced and the style of quarters for soldiers has so changed, with plumbing, solid walls, and sanitary conveniences, that $100,000 would be a better sum to name now, than $20,000 was for our Army of 10,000.

The statute further says that nothing shall be done until the title has been reported upon by the Attorney-General. Is the soldier to wait three months for titles to come from the Philippines and then three months for it to go back again?

Mr. CANNON. May I interrupt the gentleman right there?

Mr. PARKER. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. I want to suggest to the gentleman that the amendment he refers to in no way affects the service in our outlying possessions. They are cared for elsewhere. A million and a half dollars upon this bill, and he is not fair to the House.

Mr. PARKER. If I am mistaken I am glad to be corrected. I do not mean to be unfair to the House. But I will say that the establishment of posts promptly, as our men come home from the Philippines, so that we can take care of 70,000 men, is the other branch to which I was going to direct the attention of the House. It has to be done as the troops arrive.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The gentleman will allow me to ask whether the four and a half million dollars appropriated by the House is not sufficient for that purpose?

Mr. PARKER. The question is not whether the sum of four and a half million dollars already appropriated is sufficient or not. The question is whether the Secretary of War shall have this discretion. Now, I am not going to argue this question beforehand——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] has expired.

Mr. PARKER. I trust I may have one minute more.

Mr. HULL. I yield to the gentleman for a moment.

Mr. PARKER. The questions involved here are too important to be disposed of beforehand, and the Senate has a right to ask as a matter of common courtesy that we first ascertain their reasons for putting this special provision in the bill before we undertake to assume any position of this kind.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I should like to occupy about two minutes.

Mr. HULL. In connection with what the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] has said, I wish to say that there is nothing in the contention on this amendment affecting the discretion of the Secretary of War to establish a post anywhere. The question here involved is only the question to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has addressed himself—the question of discretion as to the amount which may be expended in buildings out of our appropriations. The argument of the gentleman from New Jersey would seem to indicate that the question is one as to the discretion of the Secretary of War in the establishment of posts. I do not know whether he intended to convey that impression.

Mr. PARKER. I did not.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Thirty minutes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee rose.

Mr. HULL. I first yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY]. I will yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON] afterwards.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. Speaker, I have just read in the newspapers this morning a portion of an address delivered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] last night on the waning influence of the House of Representatives and the increasing influence of the Senate. I fear there is a great deal of truth in what the gentleman from Missouri said; and it is the duty of the House right now, at the first opportunity, to demonstrate that the House of Representatives is going to stand for its rights and that the Senate can not absorb the power of this House.

Now, what is proposed by this amendment? As stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the Committee on Military Affairs has heretofore provided for the improvement of quarters at the different Army posts. The sundry civil bill has carried appropriations for permanent improvements. Now, what did we appropriate? The military bill as it passed this House appropriated $3,000,000 for improvements at our different military posts—an enormous sum, is it not? But the Senate is not content that that $3,000,000 shall go for improvements. It wants to take off the limit of $20,000 to be expended on any one building and add $1,350,000 to the appropriation and allow the Secretary of War to spend the money as he pleases. Why? At any one of the different posts throughout the country to-day the Secretary of War can not expend more than $20,000 in constructing officers' quarters or any other kind of buildings. But some of our officers believe that they ought to have mansions for quarters; they want buildings costing $40,000 or $50,000 or more.

Now, what does this amendment do? It takes off the limit. It allows the Secretary of War to construct officers' quarters that may cost $100,000, if he sees fit to expend that amount. That is "the milk in the cocoanut." That is what is behind this proposition—to allow the Secretary of War, if he so wishes, to construct officers' quarters at New York or any other place, that may cost $100,000, without any estimate and without any recommendation coming in from any committee of this House.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HEMENWAY. Yes; if it is brief.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman, I believe, wants to be entirely fair with the House.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Please put your question at once; I have only ten minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows that the appropriation of one million and a half carried on the sundry civil bill could be used for buildings of any cost. And is there any objection to this amendment that does not also apply to the appropriation carried on the sundry civil bill?

Mr. HEMENWAY. There is objection even to the million and a half carried on the sundry civil bill. But that amount being for expenditures at the different posts of the country, the pressure brought upon the Secretary of War by the different Members of Congress and Senators in favor of their respective localities prevents the expenditure of any very large sums of that appropriation in any one place; whereas if this amendment proposed by the Senate be adopted there will be nearly $6,000,000 at the discretion of the Secretary of War, to be expended at any place he may select, the result of which will be that expensive and extravagant quarters for officers may be constructed at the different posts all over these United States.

Now, let the House stand by its rights. Let us not by our action verify the story going through the newspapers every day that the House is losing its power, and that the Senate is absorbing the prerogatives of this House and crowding legislation down our throats in spite of the fact that we are the representatives fresh from the people.

I would not advocate this instruction but for the fact that it is reasonably certain that the Committee on Military Affairs favors this amendment. Why, sir, every member of that committee is here opposing this instruction.

We provide by statute that the limit shall be $20,000, yet they seek, by this appropriation and by this amendment, to remove that limit and allow the Secretary of War to construct buildings at these different points at any price he sees fit. It certainly is right and proper that the House at this time should instruct these conferees, and at the very first opportunity say that the Senate can not take up this legislation and place it on the wrong bill and give to the Secretary of War this power that every member of this House knows he ought not to have.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Give me five minutes.

Mr. HULL. I have not got the time.

Mr. CANNON. I hope my friend will be a little lenient about time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time of debate on this question be extended thirty minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended thirty minutes for the purpose of this debate. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to say anything on this question. I have no personal feeling in the matter whatever. It is simply a question of proper legislation. That is all that is involved in it. This proposition comes in a most unusual way. To enact the Senate provisions or amendments as is proposed is in violation of the rules of this House, as well as those of the Senate and the Revised Statutes. It could not be put here under our rules. It has no business here under the revised statute, which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] read, and which the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] also read. The gentleman from New Jersey states that that statute is directly in the face of this legislation. He says that the limit upon the Secretary of War, or the sum he may expend under the conditions provided for or the contingencies mentioned, should be $100,000 instead of $20,000.

Now, if that be true, and we want to enlarge the discretion of the Secretary of War, let us amend that section of the Revised Statutes. The gentleman from Illinois has quoted the statute, and the gentleman from New Jersey says it is insufficient. The proposed legislation could not be put here under the rules of the House. They come and ask us to give this discretion to the Secretary of War to build these permanent barracks. The Senate makes this enormous increase of—say a million or a million and a half of dollars—I have not the exact figures in my mind. I do not care whether it is meritorious or not, this legislation is not proper, and the resolution of Mr. CANNON should be adopted. It is a question of correct and proper legislation, and we ought not to yield to the Senate the right to put this appropriation here.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will in a minute. The revised statute requires that it shall be made after a proper estimate shall be submitted, and there have been no estimates submitted by the Department, and if so, that estimate would have gone to the Committee on Appropriations, placed on file there, and the Committee on Appropriations would have reported the proper amount for the required work in the sundry civil bill. I understand the gentleman from Illinois to say his committee has the estimates from the Department for the work, and has made the appropriation regularly. The Military Committee in the Senate, or the Senate for that committee, usurped the right that belongs to the Appropriations Committee, and without proper estimate comes and increases the expenditures over a million of dollars.

Now, I am not going into the details. I did not purpose going into the merits of the question except to say that it is the duty of the House of Representatives, it is the duty of this side of the House, it seems to me, in matters of this kind, to stand by the rules of the House, for in that only is the safety of the House, and especially the protection of the minority of the House. I hope the instructions contained in the pending resolution will be given. They are not unusual, as my friend from Virginia thinks. Why, it has not been a week since we saw a conference committee appointed here and instructions given before the conferees left this floor.

Mr. HAY. No, the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia. I am not mistaken.

Mr. HAY. I will ask the gentleman if it was not a fact that before the conferees on the omnibus claims bill, to which the gentleman refers, were instructed, that the House had gone into Committee of the Whole and had voted down the Selfridge claims?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HAY. Now, you are proposing to instruct the conferees upon questions which have not been acted upon by the House at all.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Neither had that been acted upon by the House at all, but simply by a committee of the House—the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HAY. Yes, it had. It had been voted out of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will answer my friend. I understand his question. It has been done by the committee of the House. The Committee of the Whole is but a committee of the House, and the Committee of the Whole took the action which my friend indicates. That is true, but the House of Representatives ranks the Committee of the Whole and all the committees of the House of Representatives. We had a perfect right when the House saw fit to do it to instruct the conferees not to agree to the Selfridge-board claims, and they did do it. There is no disrespect in giving instructions, and there is no discourtesy to the committee.

Mr. HAY. Now, I will ask the gentleman this question——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will yield.

Mr. HAY. Upon what premise does the gentleman assume that the conferees are going to yield to the demands of the Senate?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I do not have to assume it. I have a right to assume it, however, I think, when I see every member of the Military Committee, every member of the majority and every member of the minority of that committee undertaking to prevent these instructions.

Mr. HAY. I object to it upon the ground that they should not be instructed at this time.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. If you want to do what you say, why object to the instructions?

Mr. HAY. For the very reason that if we are instructed on those amendments it will prevent any appropriation at all passing for the temporary barracks which we provided for in the House bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Oh, I think not.

Mr. HAY. It does. It instructs us not to agree to the fourteenth amendment to the bill, which provides for the temporary barracks.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. They are taken care of elsewhere.

Mr. HAY. They are not taken care of elsewhere.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. There is no trouble about that.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman tell me where this subject is taken care of elsewhere?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I am not familiar with all the provisions of the bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] stated a moment ago that that question of barracks was taken care of. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] made the same statement. The gentleman from Illinois is now on his feet. He made that statement a few moments ago, and I will yield to him to state whether it is true.

Mr. HAY. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois where the temporary barracks are taken care of except in the House bill?

Mr. CANNON. The temporary barracks in the House bill are taken care of by the appropriation of $3,000,000, every dollar that was asked for in the estimate.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. HAY. I want to make it plain that if the conferees on this bill are instructed against the fourteenth amendment, proposed by the Senate, we could not take care of the temporary barracks which were provided for in this bill.

Mr. CANNON. My friend is in error about that.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I only want to say, Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HULL. How much time does the gentleman from Tennessee want?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Only a sentence. I wanted to say further that the instructions ought to be given, because it is in conformity with our rules and the statute to give the instructions. The legislation which these instructions will prevent ought not to be enacted, and therefore the instructions ought to be given.

Mr. SNODGRASS rose.

Mr. HULL. How much time does the gentleman from Tennessee desire?

Mr. SNODGRASS. I think five minutes will be enough.

Mr. HULL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SNODGRASS].

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this discussion at this time is irrelevant. As I understand the purposes of the committee, they are only contending for the usual courtesies which should obtain between two legislative bodies.

Gentlemen seem to apprehend that if this committee of conference should agree to the Senate amendments it would foreclose this House from disagreeing to their report. If that were so, then this discussion here at this time would be proper, but it seems to me that the remarks of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. PARKER] are well timed. We ought to remember that the Senate has the right to proceed under its rules, and we ought to assume that if it has made an amendment upon this bill it had the right to do it under its rules, and it will be only courteous and proper for us before disagreeing thus emphatically with what the Senate has done to inquire of them as to their reasons, and if our conferees should agree to those reasons and report an agreement with the Senate amendments, it would then, as I understand it, be entirely proper for the House to disagree with that and ask for a new conference, and then to instruct the conferees if the House is not satisfied with the reasons given.

Mr. CANNON. My friend does not want to mislead the House. This Senate amendment is not only against the rules of the House, but is flatly against the rules of the Senate as well.

Mr. CLAYTON. And against the law, too.

Mr. SNODGRASS. If that is true, then upon the report of our conferees we can insist upon our right to disagree, and then instruct our conferees. As a member of the Military Committee, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say that I am opposed to this Senate amendment; but I am also opposed to our making ourselves ridiculous by getting unduly alarmed at amendments coming from the Senate. I think they are entitled to be treated with reasonable and courteous consideration.

Mr. CLAYTON. May I interrupt the gentleman? Does he think that it makes the House ridiculous to insist upon standing by the rules and the law now upon the books?

Mr. SNODGRASS. Is it not ridiculous to say to the other body, "We will not consider your amendments at all?"

Mr. CLAYTON. Not when we have had our attention called to the law.

Mr. PARKER. Is not this making law?

Mr. SNODGRASS. It seems to me that is the very way to get up a feeling of hostility between the two Houses and to destroy that courteous consideration which should exist between them.

If we say here now that we will not consider the Senate amendment, and neither will we hear any report from the conference committee, because any report from that committee will be irrelevant if we make these instructions—at least in the particulars to which the instructions relate—it therefore seems to me that to adopt these resolutions at this time would be to make ourselves ridiculous.

That is the reason I have resisted the instruction of the committee at this time. I will say frankly, as I stated a while ago, that I am opposed to this Senate amendment and shall vote against agreement to it; but it seems to me that we ought to have this full and free conference before any further action is taken on the part of the House other than disagree to the Senate amendments.

Now, the Committee on Military Affairs have had this bill under consideration, and it is fair to assume that the conferees will stand by the position of the House and report a disagreement to this amendment. If it is considered that this amendment is in violation of the rules of the House, it is not fair to assume that they will act otherwise; but if they should do so it is entirely within the province of this House to disagree with their report and emphasize the position of the House by instructing other conferees not to agree to the amendment.

Mr. HULL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I dislike very much to disagree with my colleagues in a matter which affects their committee, but I think that the orderly procedure of this House is very seriously involved in this matter. If it was merely a matter of instructing the conferees on the committee in reference to a subject-matter over which they properly had jurisdiction, I grant that it would not be courteous to them, in the first instance, to give them instructions with reference to the matter. There is no question about that, but that is not the question involved in this case. Nobody for a moment has raised that point.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. SNODGRASS. If the conferees should agree to this amendment, that does not preclude the House from disagreeing to their report?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will answer my friend's question——

Mr. SNODGRASS. I say if the conferees should agree to this Senate amendment, if it does override the rules of this House, which gentlemen on this floor seem apprehensive that it will, it does not foreclose the House of its right to disagree to their report?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It certainly would not, and if they should come back with such a report the House would still have jurisdiction and could overturn the committee when they come back here. But that is not the question that is submitted. If the conferees of this House are allowed to go out and carry this question back into the conference, they are, by the silence of the House, allowed to assume jurisdiction either to approve or to disapprove a proposition that every member of the Committee on Military Affairs recognizes that their committee has not jurisdiction of.

Now, it is not a question of construction. That is not where it is going to. If it was a question of whether the Committee on Military Affairs has jurisdiction, it would be very proper to instruct them if they did not show any disposition to abide by the will of the House. That is not the question here. Here is a proposition that was put in the bill, which comes here from the Senate with a proposition that every member of the Committee on Military Affairs recognizes that that committee has not jurisdiction of, and the object is for us to say to the Senate that you can not——

Mr. HULL. I want to correct the gentleman there——

Mr. UNDERWOOD (continuing). You can not put a provision in this bill that the Committee on Military Affairs has not jurisdiction of.

Mr. HULL. That is where I want to correct the gentleman. You are not stating it correctly, because there is no question as to the jurisdiction of the committee up to the amount of $20,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly; but that is not the question.

Mr. HULL. We could change the language and still go up to four millions.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But the gentleman recognizes the Senate amendment has gone beyond the jurisdiction of his committee.

Mr. HULL. There is no question but what the Senate amendment is a change of existing law.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. And gone beyond the jurisdiction of your committee. Now, I say it is of the utmost importance to the orderly procedure of this House, and to the protection of the funds in the Treasury, that the line of demarcation between the jurisdiction of the various committees and appropriations should be clearly maintained. Why? Because if you are going to allow two committees of this House to have equal jurisdiction over appropriations coming from the great departments, if the head of a department can not get what he wants from one committee of this House, then he carries it to another committee; and then you have rivalry between the two committees to serve the department, which creates lax appropriation. It takes away the power of the House to hold down the appropriations and protect the Treasury.

This is the only way that you can do, and it has been recognized. There is a time in which the Committee on Military Affairs can ask for this jurisdiction, and they can take it. They can come to the House and ask for it. Every gentleman in the House knows that when the President sends his message here at the beginning of the session that message is accompanied by reports from the various officers of the Government. The Speaker of the House takes those reports and assigns a certain portion of that report to one committee and a certain portion to another, thereby defining the jurisdiction of the various appropriation committees in this House. In this instance he has always assigned all matters involving permanent barracks and permanent buildings of the Army to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to have one minute more.

Mr. HULL. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD (continuing). These matters have always been referred to the general Appropriations Committee. They have always had jurisdiction of it, and carried these matters in the sundry civil appropriation bill. As to matters of small repair and improvements, these matters have been assigned to the Committee on Military Affairs, and it was done in this instance. But under the law they are limited in their expenditures and their appropriations to $20,000.

Now, here is a case where the Senate has violated the law, assumed jurisdiction that does not belong to them, and it is merely an effort on the part of this House to say that we are going to maintain the line of demarcation between the jurisdiction of these two committees that we established in the beginning of the session. In the beginning of the session, when these various portions of the President's message were assigned to committees, the gentleman from Iowa could have arisen and insisted that the House give his committee jurisdiction instead of the Appropriation Committee. But he did not do it. The Appropriation Committee took it up and did not give the Department all the money it wanted, or did not think they ought to have it; and now the Department goes to another committee and seeks to give them jurisdiction over the matter without estimates.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. At this time it seems rather strange to hear the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations urge in support of his resolution that it grants to the Committee on Military Affairs jurisdiction over matters that such committee would not have without the adoption by the House of these amendments of the Senate. I venture to say that the sundry civil appropriation bill, now in conference, in charge of the gentleman from Illinois, and the bill reported in the last House contain many provisions that change existing law. All of these contain provisions over which the Committee on Appropriations in this House would have no jurisdiction at all but for the adoption of Senate amendments, and this House has always passed them without question, and the gentleman from Illinois has never yet been known to object at this jurisdiction being thrust upon him. It comes with poor grace from him to raise that question.

It seems to me the point the House should consider is this: This bill comes back to the House with a Senate amendment which changes existing law. The Committee on Military Affairs favored nonconcurring with the amendments, and the House has voted to disagree to the amendments. This requires there should be and will be a full and free conference with the Senate. If there be a full and free conference the conferees will be bound by the mandate of the committee and of this House to disagree with these propositions. Then they should bring it back to this House, when can be fully considered the necessity for changing existing law. This amendment does not violate any existing law; it contemplates the change of existing law.

Whether or not that change ought to be made should not now be considered. Undoubtedly there are reasons why the change should be made. Undoubtedly there are reasons why the change should not be made. The House now should not consider what those reasons are on either side of the proposition. There is only one thing that now should be considered, and that is whether or not there should be a full and free conference with the Senate. The House yields none of its prerogatives. On the other hand, by following and adopting the pending resolution the House does tie the hands of the conferees. It ties their hands so that the conferees of the House can not have a fair chance to settle the various points of difference with the conferees of the Senate.

Now, it is useless to talk about putting legislation on this or any other bill that violates the rules of this House. The Senate does it frequently and we adopt it constantly. It is done more on the bills handled by the gentleman from Illinois than upon any other bills which come before the House. That matter should not now be considered, and least of all upon a motion made under these circumstances. The legislation should be considered upon its merits when it comes before the House in a proper way, when it comes before the House so that all facts and all arguments can be properly weighed. When it does come back on the report of the conferees, such report can be adopted or it can be rejected or it can be modified. All of these reasons that may be applicable can be considered in Committee of the Whole upon the coming back of the conference report. Right now the thing for this House to do to uphold its dignity is to give the conferees the power for a full and free conference, and for that reason the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois should be disagreed to.

Mr. PRINCE. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some contention as to whether the House should stand by the Military Committee or whether it should stand by the resolution introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. What really is the status of this measure? The bill was originally introduced into this House and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. The committee had originally jurisdiction of this question. The Committee on Military Affairs prepared a measure, properly presented it to the House, and the House passed it, and it went to the Senate. Up to this time no question of jurisdiction can possibly be raised as against the measure. The Senate makes some amendments to the measure, of which the House Committee on Military Affairs has original exclusive jurisdiction.

Now, the question is presented whether because something else has been inserted in that measure in the form of an amendment the House Committee on Military Affairs loses jurisdiction on this measure in part, and must be instructed by members of the Appropriation Committee as to how to proceed in the matter which legitimately belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs. Amendments have been made by the Senate. We must take it for granted, gentlemen of the House, that the Military Committee of the Senate had a reason, or reasons, for making the proposed amendments and sending them to this body. If they had, why should we not hear them in an orderly way through the properly constituted committee of conference?

Is there any harm in these conferees being appointed untrammeled to go to the other body and then reporting to this body the result of the conference? It is divulging no secrets of this House to say that when this bill was brought back amended and referred to the Military Committee that that committee unanimously directed the conferees, when appointed, to resist all of these amendments specifically and so report to this House. After the reasons of the Senate have been heard, let the matter be brought before the House so that we may understand those reasons fully.

Let me say to the House that we have never known the Military Committee or a conference committee formed from the members of that Committee to go against the wishes of this House. They have never stood here pretending to do one thing and doing another. They have ever been amenable to the wishes of the House. They have ever sought to carry out those wishes. Why then at this time should the House want to trammel this committee in this way? I say that a distinguished committee of the House, such as this committee, ought not to be so treated by their fellow-members. I ask gentlemen upon both sides of the House, irrespective of party questions, to stand by the Military Committee, to stand by the ordinary method of procedure, to see that the conferees are appointed in the regular orderly method, and our action conveyed in that way to the other Chamber. When these conferees return to the House, then, if they have in any respect violated the judgment of the House, we can go against them, but not till then.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there remaining?

The SPEAKER. Twenty-seven minutes.

Mr. HULL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET].

Mr. OVERSTREET. Mr. Speaker, I am not a member of either the Appropriations Committee or the Committee on Naval Affairs. I think it only fair that members should take into consideration the judgment of members who have no feeling as connected with either of these committees.

I shall express no opinion as to the merits of the amendments which the Senate has placed upon this military appropriation bill. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that when a committee of conference has been given jurisdiction of a great subject involving millions of dollars it is entitled to enter into a fair and free conference without in the first instance receiving instructions from the House.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the gentleman yield for a question? I wish to ask how the committee got jurisdiction of this subject—whether under the rules of the Senate or the House?

Mr. OVERSTREET. It had jurisdiction under the rules of the House regulating our action upon the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Is this the Army appropriation bill?

Mr. OVERSTREET. The gentleman must not take up more of my limited time. He refused to entertain questions himself.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Oh, no; I answered every question.

Mr. OVERSTREET. I think the only question for us to consider now is this: Shall the Military Affairs Committee have one free conference? We have not before us now a conference report. This question comes back to us for the first time since the passage of the bill by the House. The appointment of conferees has not even been asked until now, when it is asked by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I do not know what this committee may do, and I will be fair and say I do not care, so far as the amendment in which the gentleman from Illinois is interested may be concerned.

But, Mr. Speaker, when one committee, even though it be the great Appropriations Committee, sees fit to establish itself as a censor over all the other committees, it is not treason for us to ask that another committee be enabled to exercise its ordinary privileges under the rules of this House which created both committees. [Applause.]

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the membership of the Committee on Military Affairs consists of gentlemen as careful in their examination of bills, as patriotic in their motives, as cautious in reference to the expenditure of money as the great Appropriations Committee of the House. Let us give them the same fair treatment that we accord to other committees. If after the first conference they should come back having violated any of the trusts which we have committed to them, having fallen short of that care and attention which we expect from them, then will be the opportunity for the guardians of the Treasury to interpose objections and ask instruction on the part of the House.

The gentleman from Tennessee cited the action of this body a few days ago in instructing the conferees representing the Committee on War Claims upon a bill then pending. Aye, there was such action; and though I voted for those instructions it was not until after those conferees had had an opportunity for free conference. I would oppose as much for one committee as for another the imposition of instructions before there has been any opportunity for the conferees to act. But when, having had such opportunity, they have failed to measure up to it this House can afford to impose instructions.

I concede, Mr. Speaker, that the doubt having been raised here might be construed as a vote on the part of this House in favor of the Senate committee; but that is an unfair construction. We are discussing procedure and not the merits of this amendment. We are discussing the action of a committee of equal privileges on this floor and not the usurpation of rights and power by the Senate. We can leave those discussions for their proper time.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that we ought, in the first instance, to accord to this great committee of the House an opportunity for a fair and free conference. If they should come in here later reporting this amendment struck out it would only prove the justice and propriety of this action. If, on the other hand, after considering the merits of the question, they should recommend in favor of the amendment that will be a time and an opportunity for instruction if it be deemed necessary. But I appeal to members of all parties to see to it that one committee shall not establish the criterion for the conduct of all.

Mr. CANNON rose.

Mr. HULL. How much time remains?

The SPEAKER. Twenty-two minutes.

Mr. HULL. How much time does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] desire?

Mr. CANNON. Only a little; five minutes, or perhaps a little more.

Mr. HULL. I yield to the gentleman five minutes.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, let us take our bearings. This is not a question of committees. What is a committee? Is it larger than the power that creates it? I always supposed the committees of this House were the servants of this House, to proceed under rule and register the will of the House. If the contrary is true, then we have 50 committees that are bigger than the House is.

Now, then, this is no question of committee jealousy. It is a question of this House registering its decree that shall bind the committee, aye, shall bind even my fair-haired friend from Indiana [Mr. OVERSTREET], who does not care the snap of his finger, as he snaps them in my face, about the merits of this proposition. Oh, no. What is the proposition? It is to go against the rules of the House and the rules of the Senate, against existing law, and to give, without being asked for by the Executive, $1,350,000, not authorized by law, and change the law. Who asks it? The Secretary of War? No. The President of the United States? No. Yet, my friend, eminent in the councils of his party, does not care three hurrahs in the hot place about the merits of this proposition. [Laughter.] Oh, sir, I will tell you, you and I will need a better record than we are making touching expenditures when we go on the hustings next fall.

Now, the roll has been called of the gentlemen on this Committee on Military Affairs—there is my friend there, my two or three friends over there, my estimable friend from Minnesota, and my estimable colleague from Illinois. The roll has been called and they say, do not reflect on this committee. Nobody wants to reflect on it. It is acknowledged on the floor of this House that the disagreement with the Senate is pro forma, like nearly all disagreements upon Senate amendments. It is acknowledged by this committee that they are for the Senate amendments.

Mr. OVERSTREET. That is not true.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Of course it is true.

Mr. OVERSTREET (addressing Mr. HULL). Why, you do not acknowledge that you are for this amendment?

Mr. HULL. No; I do not.

Mr. CANNON. The committee has, as I understand the gentleman, declared it is in favor of this amendment.

Mr. HULL. Oh, no; it declared that it is against it.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, well, pro forma against it, but you yourself will not rise in your place and say you are against it.

Mr. HULL. I will rise in my place presently.

Mr. CANNON. Nor will the gentleman from Virginia on that side of the House rise in his place and say he is against it.

Mr. HAY. Yes; I will say that I am against increasing this appropriation one dollar.

Mr. CANNON. Well, but the change in the law.

Mr. HAY. Oh, that is an entirely different proposition.

Mr. CANNON. That is the material thing.

Mr. HAY. Yes; it is the material thing to the Committee on Appropriations; that is what it is.

Mr. CANNON. Are you against the change of the law as proposed in the amendment of the Senate?

Mr. HULL (addressing Mr. HAY). What do you want to go on the stand now for? [Laughter.]

Mr. CANNON. That is right. Is there another mourner present? [Laughter.]

Mr. HAY. I am not afraid to answer the question of the gentleman. I will say to the gentleman when that question comes up that I will debate it with him.

Mr. CANNON. What is the practical effect of all this? We offer this resolution to tell this committee that the House creates, as it creates all other committees, what the opinion of the House is about this. It is not uncommon; it is not unparliamentary; it is not improper. On the contrary, it is highly proper. How do these great bills become settled? By going to conference. When will it be reported? Probably in the last twenty minutes——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HULL. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON. Well, the gentleman has twenty-two minutes. Let me have two minutes.

Mr. HULL. I have.

Mr. CANNON. Well, now, on the last day of the session this bill is to come back, when the House is pressed from every standpoint and can have no time to consider it, and my friend from Iowa [Mr. HULL] will go around and say, "Oh, stand by us; it is not just right, but we have no time, the time for adjournment is fixed." That is a very common thing. By this kind of proceeding the Senate puts the House at a disadvantage, and this practice is responsible for multiplying tens of millions of bad appropriations and bad legislation. To-day we have the time. The question has been discussed. I believe this House ought to be, and I hope is, against duplicating this appropriation and changing this law in this way. Therefore I have offered this resolution and asked the House to adopt it.

Now, suppose you do not adopt it. The negative is that the House is for it, and the conferees would be justified in agreeing to the $1,350,000 increase and the change in the law. There it is. I am in entirely good temper over it, although sometimes I get very much in earnest about it. Sometimes I think, when somebody tries to avoid the merits of a question and opens his mouth and throws his head back and says, "May the Almighty Father damn this Committee on Appropriations that is trying to boss us," that such method of warfare is awfully cheap, I will say to my colleague from Illinois.

Mr. HULL. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CAPRON].

Mr. CAPRON. Mr. Speaker, in the three minutes which have been yielded to me I propose to address myself principally to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and at the end of that time I expect the gentleman from Illinois will ask permission of this House to withdraw this resolution. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why not speak to the merits of the resolution instead of to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CAPRON. The argument we have heard here has been interesting; perhaps it is instructive, but it ought not to result in instructions. I will ask you, gentlemen, in all seriousness, you who have walked from here to the other end of the Capitol until you have worn down the flagstones going to and coming from conference committees, I will ask you if you feel that at the first going forth from this House you go instructed you would be in any different attitude from the Senate conferees if they were to meet you, saying "the Senate has placed an amendment on this bill and the Senate has instructed us by a vote not to recede from that amendment?" I know what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] would say under those circumstances. He would say: "Gentlemen of the Senate conferees, we will go back to the House, because there is nothing upon which to confer;" and I hope the House does not propose to put its conferees in that attitude.

Mr. CANNON. And then the Senate would back down or the bill would fail.

Mr. CAPRON. And if your conferees meet the Senate conferees upon the 17 or 18 amendments that the Senate have placed upon this bill and can not find the Senate conferees ready to yield upon those which the conferees shall consider contrary to our rules and to the law, then I suppose the gentlemen representing this House will say the same thing in the same words which my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] has used; but you propose to deprive them of ever having that opportunity, and I do not believe any conferees ever ought to be sent from this body without the opportunity to have a full and free conference. I do not believe they ought to go over there with their hands tied behind them and their tongues tied in their mouths, because that is not conference at all. We might as well send over a phonograph and unwind it and let that talk to the Senate conferees.

I believe your conferees ought to be appointed from those in whom the House has confidence, and then if we come back, having failed to discharge our duty, it will be ample time to say, and I hope that at that time the gentleman from Illinois will say, as has been said in the past upon a bill, as I very well remember, "These conferees are not acting according to the will of the House," and then there will be other conferees appointed.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield five minutes to me?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I should like to close the debate. I have promised to yield to the gentleman from Virginia three minutes.

Mr. HAY. I will yield that time to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman will do that, then I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I think there is one view of this situation that has not been presented to the House. This resolution does not impart censure to this committee, and it is necessary in my view, because of an evil habit that has grown up in this House with regard to matters of this kind.

The House has not considered one of the Senate amendments. The rules of this House contemplate that they should be considered. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] asks unanimous consent that the House do not consider them, that the House nonconcur in them and turn them over to the conference committee without one word having been uttered as to what the preference of the House is with regard to those matters. They are Senate amendments. They have not been discussed in the House. The committee of conference will have nothing to guide them as to the will of the House, and therefore this resolution that does signify the preference of this House is, in my judgment, entirely proper to be given to them.

I might go a step further and say that I believe this House is the victim of two forces—two bodies constantly encroaching upon the prerogatives and rights of the House. One is the Senate of the United States. The other is the conference committees of this House. [Applause.] How many times has this House been betrayed by its own committees? How many times have things important to the House been surrendered by its conferees and the House placed in a position where it could not protect itself? I think it is time that something should be done; that the conference committees of the House should be given to understand their duties in this matter. And, mind you, the House does not select the conference committees. Mind you, the Speaker does not select them. They are selected through a custom, and before a conference committee is appointed we always know who will be on that committee.

If it is an amendment put on in the House, in almost every instance it is an amendment against the preference of the committee; and if they maintain the views of the House, they surrender their own. So it often happens that these gentlemen, beaten in the House, get their revenge by surrendering to the Senate amendment [applause], often possibly securing their reenactment in order that they may agree to them.

Mr. CLARK. I will ask the gentlemen from Iowa if he does not think the custom ought to be adopted by the House that has been adopted in the Senate—to appoint conferees in favor of the thing that this body adopts, without reference to rank on the committee?

Mr. HEPBURN. It often happens the conferees appointed by the House are opposed to the will of the House as expressed in legislation on their bill. The committee brings in a bill. We have the right to assume that they are in favor of it. It is the pleasure of the majority of the House to change it. It is against their will, and they right themselves, not here, but in the conference committee. Now, I do not think it is disrespectful when I vote for this resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois. I am not disrespectful to my colleague from Iowa. I respect him; I honor him; but he does not know at this moment what the will of this House is, because he has taken the means himself of precluding himself from having that information by asking that a pro forma disagreement be indulged in and the whole subject referred to himself.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] simply does not understand anything about the action of the Committee on Military Affairs when he speaks about the mere pro forma disagreement. The course of action that this bill has undergone is the almost universal action in the House, practically, of disagreeing to all the amendments and the appointment of a conference committee. If we had gone into Committee of the Whole House and had passed upon these amendments, unless we had agreed to the amendments there would have been no difference in the action so far as the House is concerned as to this bill other than that already taken by the House.

The proposition that measures are offered in the House and voted down, and then conferees appointed and give away the contention of the House, has no application in this matter at all, because these amendments were put on the bill in the Senate, and no member of the House has put himself on record as in favor of them. Now, so far as the jurisdiction is concerned, that is not in issue and can not be in this House, because you can not limit by the rules of the House what the Senate may put upon a bill. But if the conferees on the part of the House come back here with a report that in the judgment of the House is surrendering any of its prerogatives, then the House has the power, as it did with the Committee on War Claims, to vote down the report and instruct the conferees. I think every member of the House realizes that a thoughtful member will be very careful not to bring in a report that he feels is contrary to the judgment of the House.

Now, as to the proposition of my friend from Illinois that it is common to hold back these great bills until the last hours of the session and then bring them here under whip and spur with the threat that unless they are adopted in a conference report by the House there will be no bill passed, I think he must speak from experience of his committee in that respect and not of matters coming from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CANNON. I do.

Mr. HULL. I say to this House that no bill reported by a conference committee from the Committee on Military Affairs has ever been held back until the closing hours, or that we have ever undertaken in any way to get snap judgment on the House.

Mr. CANNON. I do speak from experience, and respectfully, of a body in another place, that it is a part and parcel of its policy to hold these great measures until they are driven through in the last twelve or twenty-four hours of the session.

Mr. HULL. On that theory, you could instruct your committee so that it could not go into a free conference, and the Senate could hold back, and say that they will not have any conference at all if they can not discuss these matters, and hold the matter up to the last of the session; and they would have some reason for such action.

Mr. CANNON. But if we instruct the conferees, you will be powerless to ever agree.

Mr. HULL. That is true; we are powerless to agree, and the bill would fall on the same theory. So there is nothing in that argument one way or the other.

The gentleman from Indiana seemed to be terribly frightened over this idea that we were giving too great jurisdiction to the Secretary of War.

Mr. SHATTUC. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. SHATTUC. Will this be the last opportunity that we will have to show our independence of the Senate?

Mr. HULL. Oh, no; I should think not. I think it would be a terrible thing if so. The gentleman from Indiana submits——

Mr. GROW. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. HULL. I have only two or three minutes. I want to conclude the suggestion I was making. The gentleman from Indiana made his argument on the theory that we were giving the Secretary of War such an enormous jurisdiction over appropriations. I want to say to this House that that is not a fair argument, because there is no appropriation passed by the Appropriations Committee that limits the Secretary of War to any amount of money that he may spend or that he will put into a building, and I think the idea that he will put in any more than will erect the building is an absurdity.

The gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, has based almost his entire argument on the theory that here is a million and a half dollars proposed by the Senate, not asked for by any Department, and that, of course, we are going to give it to them. I submit to the House, Is it fair for any man, even for the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to assume that this committee is inclined to give beyond the amount asked for by the Department? Is that fair? I want to say to you that I have not heard a member of the committee advocate the theory of giving the extra million and a half dollars. There is no reason to believe that the conferees will ever agree to giving more than is asked for by the Government. The gentleman's argument on that subject is, to my mind, absolutely without force. If we were to do that and come before the House, the argument he makes would then be pertinent. He could say that we had tried to give more money than the Government wanted for certain purposes.

I do not know—and I assume that no other member knows—why the Senate wanted to increase that so largely. But I do know this, that the Committee on Military Affairs in place of giving beyond the estimates of the Government, have pared them down in almost every case. It is fair to assume that they will do the same in this.

Mr. Speaker, my contention now, as it has been from the beginning, is, not to argue as to the merits of the amendment until it comes before the House. The proposition now is not whether we shall adopt them or not; my proposition is that it is unusual, it is not right to instruct the committee of the House before it has had a conference. It is not fair to assume that they are going to violate any of the proprieties until they have had an opportunity to bring before the House their work, and let the House see whether they are violating them or not. I do not believe, after what the gentleman from Illinois has said, that I am violating any confidence when I state that I offered to bring in a disagreement on the measure so that it might be voted upon directly and independently by the House if the gentleman would allow it to go to conference without instructions, but it was not thought best to do it. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa demands the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CANNON) there were 107 ayes and 50 noes.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order now for me to change my motion that the House nonconcur in the amendments, and agree to certain amendments and let it go without a conference?

The SPEAKER. The House has already voted to ask for conferees.

Mr. HULL. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider that vote so that we may dispose of it in the House without a conference. I move to reconsider the vote.

Mr. CANNON. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves to reconsider the vote by which the conference was asked for, and the gentleman from Illinois moves to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. HULL. Will the gentleman allow me to say——

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to lay the motion of the gentleman from Iowa on the table.

The question was taken; and the motion to lay the motion on the table was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HULL, Mr. CAPRON, and Mr. HAY.

PENSION BILLS WITH SENATE AMENDMENTS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following pension bills with Senate amendments, which amendments were severally read, and, on motion of Mr. SULLOWAY, concurred in:

A bill (H. R. 2857) granting an increase of pension to Frances J. Haughton;

A bill (H. R. 7397) granting a pension to Louisa White;

A bill (H. R. 1346) granting a pension to Adelbert L. Orr;

A bill (H. R. 6625) granting an increase of pension to Mary C. Downing; and

A bill (H. R. 9606) granting a pension to Charles Blitz.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to House bills of the following titles, when, on motion of Mr. SULLOWAY, the House nonconcurred in the amendments, respectively, and asked a conference with the Senate; whereupon the appointment of House conferees was announced in each case as indicated:

A bill (H. R. 4103) granting a pension to William C. Hickox; House conferees, Mr. SULLOWAY, Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH, and Mr. NORTON.

A bill (H. R. 8794) granting an increase of pension to Henry I. Smith; House conferees, Mr. RUMPLE, Mr. DEEMER, and Mr. MIERS of Indiana.

A bill (H. R. 8840) granting an increase of pension to John H. Lauchly; House conferees, Mr. GIBSON, Mr. KLEBERG, and Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH.

A bill (H. R. 9544) granting an increase of pension to George W. Barry; House conferees, Mr. SULLOWAY, Mr. KLEBERG, and Mr. GIBSON.

A bill (H. R. 10505) granting an increase of pension to Solomon P. Brockway; House conferees, Mr. GIBSON, Mr. DARRAGH, and Mr. MIERS of Indiana.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. CURTIS obtained leave of absence for ten days, on account of important business.

OLE STEENSLAND.

Mr. GIBSON. I rise to present a conference report, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10782) granting a pension to Ole Steensland, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendment.

HENRY R. GIBSON,
W. A. CALDERHEAD,
ROBERT W. MIERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

A. G. FOSTER,
J. C. PRITCHARD,
JAMES P. TALIAFERRO,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The bill originally passed the House granting a pension of $24 per month; the Senate, by amendment, reduced the rate of the pension to $12 per month.

The result of the conference is that the Senate recedes from its amendment, and this leaves the rate of the pension at $24 per month, as fixed originally by the House.

HENRY R. GIBSON,
W. A. CALDERHEAD,
ROBERT W. MIERS,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

INAUGURATION OF CUBAN REPUBLIC.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, That this House views with satisfaction, and expresses congratulation at, the appearance this day of the Cuban Republic among the nations of the world.

[Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution? [A pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, it is evidently unnecessary that there should be any debate on this resolution. I will merely say that it was suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] [applause]; and I know that all members on both sides of the House will welcome the opportunity to vote for it.

The question being taken, the resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

PASSPORTS.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, under the special order made by the House, I call up House bill 8129.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the order of the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, by unanimous consent, it was ordered that immediately after the disposition of the bill H. R. 12543, "A bill to enable the people of Oklahoma, Arizona, and New Mexico to form constitutions and State governments and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," the House shall proceed to the consideration of the bill H. R. 8129, "A bill to amend sections 4075, 4076, and 4078 of the Revised Statutes."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill referred to in the order of the House.

The bill as amended by the committee was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 4075 of the Revised Statutes of the United States is hereby amended by inserting after the phrase "consular officers of the United States" the following: "and by such chief or other consular officer of the insular possessions of the United States."

SEC. 2. That section 4076 of the Revised Statutes is hereby amended so as to read as follows: "No passport shall be granted or issued to or verified for any other persons than those owing allegiance, whether citizens or not, to the United States."

SEC. 3. That section 4078 is hereby amended so as to read: "If any person acting or claiming to act in any office or capacity under the United States, its possessions, or any of the States of the United States, who shall not be lawfully authorized so to do, shall grant, issue, or verify any passport or other instrument in the nature of a passport to or for any person owing allegiance, whether a citizen or not, to the United States, or to or for any person claiming to be or designated as such in such passport or verification, or if any consular officer who shall be authorized to grant, issue, or verify passports shall knowingly and willfully grant, issue, or verify any such passport to or for any person not owing allegiance, whether a citizen or not, to the United States, he shall be imprisoned for not more than one year or fined not more than $500, or both; and may be charged, proceeded against, tried, convicted, and dealt with therefor in the district where he may be arrested or in custody.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to submit to the House the reason for the passage of this bill, I would like to move an amendment to correct a typographical error. On page 2, line 7, amend by striking out the word "consular" and inserting the word "executive;" so as to read "executive officer" instead of "consular officer." It is a typographical error in the printing of the bill.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the amendment referred to will be agreed to.

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, I simply would state for the information of the House that this is a bill that came from the Department of State and is reported unanimously by the Committee on Foreign Affairs. The sole object of the measure is to enable the State Department to issue passports to all the citizens of the United States and those of our recent possessions. As the law now stands it reads that the State Department has authority to issue passports to citizens of the United States, but in the opinion of that Department it prohibited them from issuing passports to the citizens of the islands of Porto Rico and the Philippines. In order to overcome this difficulty this bill has been drafted with great care, having been submitted to the Attorney-General, and, after careful consideration by the Foreign Affairs Committee, as I have already said, is unanimously reported.

The inhabitants that have come under the dominion of the United States, being under its sovereignty, are entitled to its protection, and as a sequence to that are entitled to evidences in the form of passports to show for their protection wherever they may go. It has been the custom of the State Department sometimes to issue certificates in lieu of passports, but as the laws of some of the countries demand passports for admission thereto, or in recognition of the citizenship of the people of the other countries, it is necessary this should be done in order to enable the State Department to give these people evidence that they are under the protection of the country and to exhibit it wherever they may go. The amendment simply revises the statute in that respect and has no other object.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to have five or ten minutes.

Mr. ADAMS. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for ten minutes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, my attention had never been called to this bill until it was reported some ten or twelve days ago, and as I heard it read from the Clerk's desk it occurred to me as one that proposed to make some rather radical if not dangerous changes in our statutes relative to passports. It seems to have come at the suggestion of the Secretary of State. Indeed, sir, the bill before the committee, as I understand from their report, was drafted by the Secretary of State himself.

But the question arises as to whether the change proposed by this bill is an advisable one. The Secretary of State sent in a bill to the chairman of the committee which proposed to strike from the existing statute the words "citizens of the United States" in one section and "citizen of the United States" in another section, and to insert "persons owing permanent allegiance to the United States" in the place of the one and "person owing permanent allegiance to the United States" instead of the other. The present statute, section 4076, reads as follows:

No passport shall be granted or issued to or verified for any other person than a citizen of the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I shall not undertake to discuss the political status of the people in the Philippine Islands. I take it that there is no one to deny that the residents of Porto Rico and Hawaii are at present citizens of the United States. So that this bill, in its practical application, has reference solely to the residents of the Philippine Islands. I may say, briefly, that I believe that the residents of the Philippine Islands are citizens of the United States. I believe that they owe permanent and unqualified allegiance to the United States, and I believe, on the other hand, that the Government of the United States owes an absolute duty to these people, as they owe a permanent allegiance to that Government, to protect them as it does other citizens.

I believe that the present statute upon the books is broad enough to authorize the issuing of passports to the citizens of the Philippine Islands; but there are gentlemen on the other side and perhaps some on this side who disagree with me upon that proposition. I would be willing to unite with them on some expression that would clearly embrace the citizens of the Philippine Islands, without compromising the position of either party. I believe that if the committee had adopted the bill as proposed by the Secretary of State, it would have served their purpose and would not have compromised anybody's views upon the question as to the status of the Filipinos.

The proposition of the Secretary of State was that you should strike out the word "citizen" and authorize the issuing of passports to all persons "owing permanent allegiance to the Government of the United States." You could have supported that proposition; I could have supported it. But the committee have seen proper to change that language, and they propose to say that passports may be issued to persons who owe allegiance to the United States, whether they be citizens or not. In other words, the position of the committee is that there may be people who owe permanent allegiance to the United States but who are not citizens thereof.

Now, my criticism upon the language proposed by the committee is that there are different kinds of allegiance owing to the Government. There is what is known as a temporary allegiance, as well as that of permanent or unqualified allegiance. There are a great many people in this country who owe temporary allegiance to the United States who are not citizens of the United States. Every man knows this to be true. So that under this bill you propose to authorize the Secretary of State to issue passports to people who are not citizens of the United States and who do not owe permanent allegiance to its Government. So far as I am advised, there is not a government under the shining sun that undertakes to issue passports to people who are not citizens of that government. If you pass this bill, you place your Government in the attitude of authorizing passports to people who owe but temporary allegiance to your Government, because you use merely the expression "allegiance," whereas the Secretary of State used the expression "permanent allegiance."

Now, as I said, I would be perfectly willing to accept the proposition of the Secretary of State. I believe that the residents of the Philippine Islands owe permanent allegiance to the Government of the United States, and, believing that, I would be willing to pass a law that would authorize the issue of passports to all persons who owe permanent allegiance to the United States. But you ask me to go further by your amendment; you ask me to vote for a proposition that will authorize the Secretary of State to issue passports to everybody that owes any kind of allegiance to the Government of the United States, and I am unwilling to support that kind of a proposition. It will bring about confusion and perplexity to the Secretary of State in the administration of your passport laws, and I believe that it is an inadvisable amendment. I believe that it ought to be voted down and that the provision as drafted by the Secretary of State ought to be passed by the House in lieu of it.

Mr. ADAMS. In regard to the objection of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] I would state that the word "permanent" is only an adjective; that all allegiance is permanent until it is broken by the Government or broken by the citizen. The word "permanent" does not reenforce the fact of allegiance. It is simply an adjective.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. If the gentleman will refer to the case of Radich v. Hutchins (95 U. S.), and to the case of Carlisle v. The United States, reported in 16 Wallace, he will see that the court says:

As a foreigner domiciled in the United States he was bound to obey all the laws of the United States not immediately relating to citizenship and was equally amenable with citizens to the penalties prescribed for their infraction. He owed allegiance to the Government of the country so long as he was therein.

So that there is such a thing as a temporary allegiance.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Speaker, passports are not issued to foreigners temporarily residing in any country.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Yes; but you are proposing to pass a law that will authorize it.

Mr. ADAMS. Not at all.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I think I have demonstrated it.

Mr. ADAMS. Not at all. The kind of allegiance referred to in that case is what you may call a police allegiance, which simply is imposed on foreigners temporarily residing in any country, that they will be amenable to the laws and do no act that would bring discredit or warfare upon that country.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. It is a temporary allegiance.

Mr. ADAMS. That may be, but it is a specified kind, understood in international law between different countries, and has no reference to the allegiance due between the inhabitants of any country and the government thereof.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Let me ask you this question: You authorize the issuing of a passport to anyone who owes allegiance to the United States. Now, does not that cover any kind of allegiance that a person may owe?

Mr. ADAMS. No, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Why does it not?

Mr. ADAMS. Simply because residents and inhabitants of a foreign country are never granted passports in the country in which they temporarily reside.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. But if you pass this bill you authorize this Government to do so.

Mr. ADAMS. Then you will fall from the established rule that prevails in all nations of the world.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Now, the gentleman knows that they can not secure passports at all under the law at present.

Mr. ADAMS. And they will not under this law. They are citizens of a foreign country temporarily residing, and they can not be granted passports and can not apply for them.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. The gentleman has abandoned the expression of our present statute, "citizens," and designated people who are entitled to passports "persons owing allegiance to the United States," which is a change of the entire system. You are undertaking to say that any person who owes allegiance to the United States shall be entitled to a passport, and this will cover persons owing temporary allegiance.

Mr. ADAMS. The gentleman does not distinguish between foreigners and residents that owe temporary allegiance; referred to here is permanent allegiance, but not necessary to say that. All allegiance is permanent until forfeited or broken by act of disloyalty. It is permanent in its very nature. The adjective adds no force to the temporary allegiance.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. You say the allegiance referred to in this bill is permanent?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. What objection can there be to accepting the proposition of the Secretary of State, and saying "permanent?"

Mr. ADAMS. That is the Secretary's opinion, but it adds no force. When this question was before the Committee the provision in this measure that the gentleman from Kentucky refers to was changed in the language of this bill so as to meet expressly the views of gentlemen on that side of the Chamber, and every member of the committee was perfectly satisfied with this bill. It is a unanimous report, and when it was discussed before the arguments in favor of this bill were made entirely by gentlemen on that side of the Chamber, as we thought it was the better way. Now, Mr. Speaker, I call for a vote on the bill.

Mr. OLMSTED. I wish to suggest an amendment, to which, I think, my colleague will agree.

The SPEAKER. Is it an amendment to the committee amendment?

Mr. OLMSTED. It is.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to his colleague?

Mr. ADAMS. I yield.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will send up his amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, beginning with the word "owing," near the end of line 20, page 2, down to and including the word "verification," in line 23, and insert in place thereof the word "whomsoever."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. CLARK. What is the amendment?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the amendment will be reported again. The Chair hears no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "persons," in line 20, page 2, strike out the words "owing allegiance, whether a citizen or not, to the United States, or to for any person claiming to be or designated as such in such passport or verification," and insert in lieu thereof the word "whomsoever."

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to explain the amendment just a moment.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to discuss the amendment?

Mr. OLMSTED. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield to his colleague?

Mr. ADAMS. I do.

The SPEAKER. How much time?

Mr. ADAMS. Five minutes.

Mr. OLMSTED. This amendment is to that portion of the bill which provides penalties for violations of its provisions. It seems to me there has been a slight omission. There are two penal provisions. The first is where a passport is issued by any person not having the authority to issue a passport at all. It provides a penalty if any such unauthorized person shall issue a passport to a person owing allegiance to the United States. The second provision is that persons authorized to issue passports shall be punished if they issue passports to any persons not owing allegiance. My amendment simply provides that any person not authorized to issue passports shall be punished if he issues passports to any person whatever, whether owing allegiance or not. As the bill now reads, an unauthorized person may be punished for issuing passports to persons owing allegiance, but can not be punished for issuing them to persons not owing allegiance.

Mr. CLARK. I do not think the gentleman's amendment accomplishes the purpose he is seeking.

Mr. OLMSTED. It simply provides that any unauthorized person who issues passports to any one whomsoever shall be subject to the penalty.

Mr. DINSMORE. I would suggest to the gentleman the language according to section 2 of the bill is equally objectionable:

No passport shall be granted or issued to or verified by any other person than those owing allegiance, whether citizens or not, to the United States.

Mr. OLMSTED. That is all right. The bill provides that no person shall issue a passport to any person not owing allegiance. And then it provides that no person not having authority to issue a passport at all may be punished if he issues a passport to anybody who does owe allegiance. My amendment makes him liable if he issues a passport to anybody at all, whether owing allegiance or not.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. I would like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania a question.

Mr. ADAMS. I yield for a question.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. As I understand, the third section follows the present statute, with the exception that it strikes out "citizens of the United States" and inserts "persons owing allegiance to the United States."

Mr. ADAMS. It does.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

The question was considered, and the amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendments as amended were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ADAMS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

PRIVATE CLAIMS.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, under the special order heretofore made.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar, with Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

ELEANORA G. GOLDSBORO.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10469) for the relief of Eleanora G. Goldsboro.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman that reported this bill, who is a member of the committee, is not present, and the gentleman who introduced the bill is not present. I therefore ask that this bill be passed without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the bill reported will be passed without prejudice.

There was no objection.

MELLERT FOUNDRY AND MACHINE COMPANY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2492) to reimburse the Mellert Foundry and Machine Company for money retained by the United States for failure to complete a contract within a specified time.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $2,427.84 be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of reimbursing the Mellert Foundry and Machine Company, Limited, of Reading, Pa., for money retained as a penalty by the United States by reason of a failure to complete a contract within a specified time.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GREEN].

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, this is a bill which has been favorably reported upon by the committee and the Secretary of War. The matter was referred to Gen. Thomas L. Casey April 16, 1892, and he states as follows:

It can not be stated that the failure of the contractors to deliver the material on time caused any loss to the United States except as follows: Inspector's pay for one month and seven days, $154.16, and master calker's pay for eight days, $40; a total of $194.16.

The contract was entered into July 12, 1890, and under the penalty clause $2,622 was retained by the United States. Deducting from this amount the $194.16, actual loss suffered by delay, there would remain in the Government's hands $2,427.84, which, without exacting the pound of flesh, as per clause in the contract, would be equitably due the contractors.

Before acting upon the measure the committee deemed it advisable to refer the matter to the Secretary of War, asking for facts and information relative to the same; also an opinion of the War Department as to the merits of the case, and for opinion received the following reply:

"The Comptroller of the Treasury has decided in recent cases of a like kind that 'one of the recognized rules of construction applicable to this case is that when damages are easily ascertainable the sum mentioned as a forfeiture will usually be treated as a penalty, even if stated to be for liquidated damages (5 Comptroller Decisions, 317), and that the courts usually show a disposition to lean toward that construction which excludes the idea of liquidated damages and permits the party to recover only the damages which he has actually sustained.' (Comp. decision of Sept. 25, 1900.)

"In view of the above decisions of the Comptroller, it would appear, if this matter is to be settled without a judicial determination, that the proposed payment might be authorized by Congress without injustice to the United States, as the amount in question ($2,427.84) represents a sum earned by the contractors over and above the actual loss or expense of the United States.

"JOHN M. WILSON,
"Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, U. S. A."

The penalty was a peculiar penalty. They were very large pipes and very small pipes, and the large pipes were got out first. This had reference to the laying of sewers. They got out the large pipes first, and there was slight delay on the small pipes, which were not ready to use by the time the contract expired, but they were furnished in time for the work to go on. The actual loss to the Government was only $192.

If this case had been two or three months later, it never would have been here, because the ruling was immediately changed on this matter. Now, this is money that was deducted from really what belonged to these people under the contract, and was deducted, as I say, under these peculiar circumstances.

Mr. PAYNE. How long ago was this transaction?

Mr. GREEN of Pennsylvania. It was a few years ago—it was in 1892. This bill was passed by the last Congress and the Congress before that. It has not been reached before this session on the Calendar. This is the first time that we have had the opportunity to take it up before the House.

The bill was laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

ANGUS A. M'PHEE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 367) for the relief of Angus A. McPhee.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Treasurer of the United States pay to Angus A. McPhee the sum of $676.85, the same being the amount of a certain judgment recovered by the United States against said McPhee on the 30th day of April, 1894, in the circuit court of the western district of Wisconsin, for $616.85, and $30 expended for costs by said McPhee in defending the action, and which judgment was paid in full by said McPhee, it being for the value of timber cut from certain lands in sections 1, 13, 11, and 23, township 45 north, of range 4, Ashland County, Wis., by said McPhee, and claimed by the United States, and which lands were subsequently determined by the Supreme Court, in the case of Wisconsin Central Railroad Company v. Forsythe, to be owned by the said railroad company under the grant of May 5, 1864.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, the facts of this case are that Congress by an act passed June 3, 1856, granted to the State of Wisconsin for railroad purposes alternate sections 6 miles on each side of the proposed railroad for railway purposes. By an act of Congress passed May 5, 1864, a similar grant was made for similar purposes alternate sections for a width of 10 miles.

After this legislation had been passed the railroad who came into the possession of the property leased the land and sold the pine timber located on the land, and then the United States set up a claim of title to the land as against the railroad company, who derived the title through this legislation I have referred to and through the investment of the men who cut the timber under authority obtained by the railroad company. He obtained a judgment in the United States court of $676.85. I read from the report:

In the meantime one Forsythe, claiming that said lands were subject to public entry, made application to enter the same, and the title to the lands conveyed by the State of Wisconsin, through its governor, became involved, and the said Forsythe took steps to obtain said lands from the United States, and was confirmed in his right by the Secretary of the Interior. The Wisconsin Central Railroad Company brought an action of ejectment in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Wisconsin for the purpose of determining its title to said lands, and the case finally reached the Supreme Court of the United States, and will be found reported as Wisconsin Central Railroad Company v. Forsythe (vol. 159, p. 46), and the opinion thereon was filed June 3, 1895; and in that case it was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that the Wisconsin Central Railroad Company obtained the title to said lands and was the owner of the lands hereinbefore particularly described under said grant, thereby showing and proving that the said Angus A. McPhee obtained the legal title to said timber by his purchase aforesaid, and that the action brought against him was wrongly decided; and he asks the United States now to return to him the money that he paid on the judgment and his necessary costs in defending said action, all of which at this time aggregates the sum of $676.85.

This bill proposes simply to pay this man back the sum of money which was wrongfully adjudged against him, because the settling of the title in the railroad company confirmed his right to cut the timber on the land.

I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

ROBERT D. M'AFEE AND JOHN CHRATOVICH.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill No. 169, for the relief of Robert D. McAfee and John Chratovich; it is No. 1249 on the Private Calendar. I think it can be very quickly disposed of.

Mr. WEEKS. I object. I think we should follow the order of the House.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I move that the bill be taken up.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. NEWLANDS, it was rejected.

W. J. TAPP & CO.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 1360) for the relief of W. J. Tapp & Co.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to W. J. Tapp & Co. the sum of $240.10, as a refund of duties erroneously exacted on certain machinery for the manufacture of jute, at Louisville, Ky., in the year 1876.

Mr. GRAFF. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. RIXEY] to explain this case.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Chairman, this bill was referred some years ago to the Committee on Ways and Means and by that committee reported favorably. It grows out of the fact that Tapp & Co. paid certain duties on what was known as jute machinery. The Secretary of the Treasury subsequently held that the duties ought not to have been collected. Tapp & Co. therefore procured the introduction of a bill for their relief, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means. That committee, after going over the whole subject, made this recommendation:

In view of the fact that the Supreme Court had decided that "a payment made to a public officer in discharge of a fee or tax illegally exacted is not such a voluntary payment as will preclude the party from recovering it back" (111 U. S., 22), your committee are of the opinion that the parties are entiled to the relief asked for, and recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

I do not suppose it is necessary to read the report made in favor of this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Is there a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. RIXEY. There does not seem to be any such letter. This report is based upon the report of the former Ways and Means Committee.

Mr. PAYNE. I understood the gentleman to say that the Secretary of the Treasury recommended the bill.

Mr. RIXEY. I said that a former Secretary of the Treasury, after the duty had been collected, held that it ought not to have been paid.

Mr. PAYNE. And this bill simply provides for the reimbursement of the amount of duty paid?

Mr. RIXEY. Yes. The amount is only $240.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CHAMBLIN, DELANEY & SCOTT.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 989) to authorize the Light-House Board to pay to Chamblin, Delaney & Scott the sum of $2,125.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Light-House Board be, and it is hereby, authorized to pay to Messrs. Chamblin, Delaney & Scott, of the city of Richmond, State of Virginia, the sum of $2,125 out of the appropriation for Marblehead light-house made by the Fifty-third Congress.

The amendments reported by the committee were read, as follows:

In line 5, after the words "the sum of," strike out "two thousand one hundred and twenty-five dollars" and insert $1,704.46, in full for all claims against the United States on account of their contract for the metal work for the Marblehead, Mass., light station."

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to authorize the Light-House Board to pay to Chamblin, Delaney & Scott the sum of $1,704.46."

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, the facts of this case are stated in a letter which will be found in the report:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., April 11, 1900.

SIR: This Department has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a letter from your committee dated March 5, 1900, inclosing a copy of H. R. bill 3531, to authorize the Light-House Board to pay to Messrs. Chamblin, Delaney & Scott the sum of $2,125, being the amount of the penalty charged against them for delay in delivery of the metal work for the Marblehead, Mass., light station, and asking that your committee be furnished with information in the matter.

In reply the Department begs leave to state that the Light-House Board, to whom the matter was referred, reports as follows:

A contract was entered into between the before-named firm and the United States on June 25, 1895, for the metal work specified, in the total sum of		$8,786.00
The work to be completed on or before November 29, 1895. By Department authority the time for the completion of the metal work was extended to December 29, 1895. Penalty provided in the contract, $25 for each and every day's delay after December 29, 1895. The work was actually completed and delivered March 23, 1896, after a delay of eighty-five days.
The cost of inspection from December 29, 1895, to March 23, 1896, was	$686.97
Payments were made to the contractors by the engineer of the Second light-house district on account of the contract in the total sum of	6,394.57
Balance unpaid		1,704.46

In other words, if the amount charged against this claimant—the amount of the expense which the Government actually incurred by reason of the delay—should be deducted, there would still be left the sum of $1,704.46, which the United States withheld in excess of any damage really incurred.

The board states that the damage to the United States on account of the delay in the completion of the metal work for this light station consists wholly in the increased cost of inspection, amounting, as before stated, to $686.97, which, being charged against the contractors, leaves an unpaid balance of $1,704.46 due them.

For these reasons, in which the Department concurs, the board recommend that this H. R. bill be amended so as to reduce the amount from $2,125 to $1,704.46, and to add after the latter amount the words "in full for all claims against the United States on account of their contract for the metal work for the Marblehead, Mass., light station," and that as so amended the bill be passed.

The committee will notice that it would be a great hardship on these people to have deducted, as has been, the amount of $1,704.46 on a contract which aggregated only $8,786 for the entire work. I therefore move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation as amended by the Committee on Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the first amendment.

Mr. GRAFF. The amendments are in the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In lines 5 and 6 strike out $2,125 and insert $1,704.46, and amend the title.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendments proposed by the committee will be adopted.

There was no objection.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

STEPHEN B. HALSEY.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10279) for the relief of Stephen B. Halsey, which the Clerk read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $50, to be paid to Stephen B. Halsey for the damage done to his dock at Astoria, Long Island, by the United States steamship Canby on August 21, 1899.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, is there no report with that bill? I think we ought to have somebody to explain these matters.

Mr. GRAFF. I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. STORM].

Mr. STORM. Mr. Chairman, the bill explains itself. It is to pay damages that were inflicted by a United States steamer to a dock at Long Island City. The estimate was that it would cost the Government $60. The man had it done for $50, and this is to reimburse him and pay this $50.

Mr. MADDOX. I can not hear the gentleman. I do not know whether anybody else can or not.

Mr. GRAFF. Well, I will state that the claim is in the sum of $50 for damages to a dock done by a vessel under the control of the United States, operated by the United States, although I believe the vessel did not belong to the United States. There is a whole volume of correspondence here which is incorporated in the report, and there is no question about the fact that the fault was on the part of those controlling the vessel and not the dock owner.

Mr. MADDOX. It is a unanimous report?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. Now, let me say this to the chairman of the committee, that I do not see a man on this side of the House representing the minority of that committee, and some of us want to know what we are voting for.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. There is Mr. KITCHIN.

Mr. GRAFF. I will say to the gentleman that I have just yielded to the gentleman from Virginia, who is on that side of the House, and to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who is on that side of the House, to explain bills.

Mr. MADDOX. The gentleman did not understand me. I say I see no member of his committee on this side of the House. There is no one here to say anything about it.

Mr. GRAFF. I would be glad to see the gentlemen here.

Mr. STORM. There is Mr. KITCHIN.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HEPBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill and joint resolution of the following titles:

H. R. 10995. An act to regulate the introduction of eggs of game birds for propagation; and

H. J. Res. 192. Joint resolution fixing the time when a certain provision of the Indian appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1903, shall take effect.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendments joint resolutions of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

H. J. Res. 113. Joint resolution authorizing the use and improvement of Governors Island, Boston Harbor; and

H. J. Res. 172. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Morgan Memorial Association, of Winchester, Va., certain Revolutionary trophies at Allegheny Arsenal, Pittsburg, Pa.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 5213. An act providing for the selection and retirement of medical officers in the Army.

BRITISH STEAMSHIP FOSCOLIA.

The committee resumed its session.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5121) for the relief of the owners of the British ship Foscolia and cargo, which the Clerk read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the owners of the British steamship Foscolia, sunk by collision with the U. S. S. Columbia on the evening of May 28, 1898, near Fire Island light-ship, for and on account of the loss of said vessel and cargo, may be submitted to the United States district court for the southern district of New York, under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine and to render judgment thereupon: Provided, however, That the investigation of said claim shall be made upon the following basis: First, the said court shall find the facts attending the loss of the said steamship Foscolia and her cargo; and second, if it shall appear that the responsibility therefor rests with the U. S. S. Columbia, the court shall then ascertain and determine the amounts which should be paid to the owners, respectively, of the Foscolia and her cargo, in order to reimburse them for the losses so sustained, and shall render a decree accordingly: Provided further, That the amounts of the losses sustained by the master, officers, and crew of the Foscolia may be included in such decree.

SEC. 2. That should such decree be rendered in favor of the owners of the Foscolia and her cargo, the amount thereof may be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

GEORGE A. ROGERS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6703) for the relief of George A. Rogers.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be appropriated, out of money not otherwise appropriated in the Treasury of the United States, the sum of $1,951.01, to pay the damages inflicted upon George A. Rogers, a contractor with the Government, while drilling from the lighter Daylight, in the East River, New York Harbor, said damages being occasioned by the running of the United States torpedo boats at an unwarranted and illegal rate of speed.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

HENRY THIERMAN AND WHITE FROST.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 9579) for the relief of Thierman & Frost.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That it be lawful for Henry Thierman and White Frost, late partners, doing business as Thierman & Frost, to institute an action against the United States in the Court of Claims for the recovery of such sum as they may in said action show themselves entitled to by reason of the seizure and sale of their distillery, located at Concordia Landing, in the county of Meade, State of Kentucky, the United States hereby waiving the defense of limitation, but reserving to themselves all other defenses.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all that has been read and insert the following:

"That jurisdiction is hereby given the Court of Claims, any statute of limitations to the contrary notwithstanding, to hear, try, and determine the claim of Henry Thierman and White Frost, late partners, doing business under the firm name and style of Thierman & Frost, by reason of the alleged unlawful seizure and sale by the revenue officers of the United States of the distillery property of the said Thierman & Frost in Concordia, in the State of Kentucky; and the said court shall have full power to determine whether said property was unlawfully seized and sold; and if the same were unlawfully seized or sold, then the said court shall try and determine whether, under the then existing laws of the United States, the said Thierman & Frost sustained any damages by reason thereof and whether the Government is or was liable under such laws for the damages sustained, limiting such damages to the reasonable value of the property seized and sold at the time of such seizure and sale; said case to be tried and determined under the laws, rules, and regulations governing proceedings in said court and upon such evidence as is legally admissible under the ordinary laws and rules of evidence as pursued in the practice of said court, hereby reserving to the Government the right to interpose any defense, whether legal or equitable, that it may have to said cause of action, except only the defenses based on the jurisdiction of the court and the statute of limitations: Provided, however, That said action shall be commenced within six months after this act shall go into effect: And provided further, That in said action the said court shall try and determine the question, notwithstanding any adjudication that may heretofore have been had, whether at the time of said seizure and sale there was any special tax due or owing by the said Thierman & Frost to the Government of the United States pertaining to said distillery, or growing out of the operation of the same, or on the output or product thereof; and if any such tax was then due or owing to the Government of the United States, the said court shall determine the amount thereof and apply the same as a set-off to any amount that may be found to have been due the said Thierman & Frost as damages sustained by them by reason of the wrongful seizure and sale of said distillery property, and shall only enter a judgment in favor of the said Thierman & Frost for such balance, if any, as may be found to be due after applying as an offset any tax as aforesaid that may be found to be due without awarding any interest to either party: And provided further, That either party to such action shall have the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States under the rules, laws, and regulations governing appeals in other cases from the Court of Claims."

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, I call for the reading of the report on that bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will read the report.

Mr. GRAFF. I would say to the gentleman that the larger portion of the report is the amendment which is incorporated in the report. It is simply that the claimants are residents of Louisville, Ky. The matter was examined into carefully by Judge THOMAS and Mr. Otey, of Virginia. Judge THOMAS is not here, and Mr. Otey, as the gentleman knows, has passed away. It is simply a reference to the Court of Claims for the adjudication of this matter and was very carefully considered.

Mr. MADDOX. I have no reason to doubt that, but I think there ought to be something on record here to show what we are doing.

Mr. GRAFF. Well, the gentleman does not desire to have that amendment reread?

Mr. MADDOX. No; if you make a statement of these matters as we come to them, as I suggested, I think it will be satisfactory.

Mr. GRAFF. I am willing to do that whenever called upon.

Mr. MADDOX. I think we ought to have some explanation as we go along.

Mr. GRAFF. I think I can shorten the matter by giving that portion of the report that does not include the text of the amendment. This bill has been pending in Congress for a good many years, and has been reported at various times. The Judiciary Committee of the House, in the Forty-seventh Congress, to whom the petition of Thierman & Frost was referred, reported as follows:

Henry Thierman and White Frost, the claimants, were distillers in Kentucky, and were assessed a deficiency bond, for per diem and special tax, of $29,100.75, from December 8, 1868, to May 26, 1869. Payment of the assessments having been refused, the distillery property was distrained. Suits were also brought on their distiller's bonds. The property was sold on distraint in July, 1870, for $1,000, from which $889 was realized as the net amount above cost and expenses.

Out of these net proceeds $438.35 was applied to the payment of an amount due for warehouse stamps, and the remainder to February, 1869, list assessments. The property sold was assessed at $4,000. In March, 1874, the suits on the bonds came to trial. The United States attorney having erroneously claimed in his declaration the whole sum due as deficiency tax, and failing to prove that a copy of the survey had been delivered to the defendants, judgment was rendered in their favor. In one of the suits, however, judgment was rendered against Henry Thierman for $100, but not against his sureties, on which execution was entered and returned nulla bona.

The petitioners ask for compensation for the value of their property sold under the distress on the ground that the subsequent judgments show that the taxes were illegal and the distress and sale void, and that the Government ought to make reparation for the damages resulting from the illegal seizure and sale. In support of their claim to establish the amount of damages they rely upon affidavits asserting a large speculative value in the property.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue reports to the committee that in this case no appeal was taken against the assessment or collection, nor any suit ever brought to recover back the tax alleged to have been illegally assessed and collected, nor did the petitioners offer to pay the taxes and charges, or to redeem the land after the sale by paying, as is required, only the amount for which the property was sacrificed, as is alleged. The claimants have failed to pursue any of the remedies provided by law; they come directly to Congress for relief. (See House Report No. 510, Forty-fourth Congress, first session.)

A careful examination of the records in the Internal-Revenue Bureau shows that the petitioners claimed in 1869 exemption from the deficiency tax for the following, among other reasons: In this, that the estimate of the yield of the distillery per bushel of grain was too high in view of the fact that their machinery was old and defective; that there was an insufficient water supply; that a series of breakages caused suspensions aggregating thirty-eight days and six hours, for which no allowance was made them.

They did not claim their suspensions were legal suspensions. In the affidavits filed by the petitioners with the Commissioner they admitted their liability for the amount against them, but alleged that if an allowance was made for the thirty-eight days and six hours' time lost by suspension, occasioned, as they say, by unavoidable accidents, the assessments against them would be reduced some $18,207.50, and the balance of $11,067.50 they offered to pay. And they stated the account thus:

And then follows the account. Now, it can be seen that in regard to this claim, which involves complex facts and the examination of the law, the best thing that this committee could do was to draft a careful amendment to the bill and refer the matter to the Court of Claims for a full examination, with the right of appeal by either party.

I move that the bill when amended be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

JOHN A. MASON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 1733) for the relief of John A. Mason.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to credit the accounts of John A. Mason, collector of internal revenue for the second collection district of New York, with the sum of $430,249.83½, being the value of internal-revenue stamps destroyed by fire at the office of said collector, No. 114 Nassau street, New York, N. Y., on the night of February 11, 1898.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying this bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, this is a pretty large claim, and I should like to have a word of explanation about it.

Mr. GRAFF. While it appears on its face to be large, it simply relates to the destruction by fire of a lot of internal-revenue stamps, and there is a recommendation here by G. W. Wilson, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, on some two or three different occasions, and by O. L. Spaulding, Acting Secretary of the Treasury, on another. I will read the one from Mr. Spaulding.

Mr. PAYNE. Will you not read the one from Mr. Wilson?

Mr. GRAFF. I will read the one from General Spaulding and then the one from Mr. Wilson:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 28, 1900.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of a letter of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, calling attention to a bill for the relief of John A. Mason, late collector of internal revenue for the second district of New York, for $430,249.81, the sum being the value of internal-revenue stamps destroyed by fire.

You will notice that the Commissioner recommends the speedy passage of the bill; and in this recommendation I concur.

Respectfully,
O. L. SPAULDING,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. JOSEPH V. GRAFF,
Chairman Committee on Claims, House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE,
Washington, May 26, 1900.

SIR: A bill is pending in Congress for the relief of John A. Mason, late collector of internal revenue of the second district of New York, for the sum of $430,249.81, the same being the value of internal-revenue stamps destroyed by fire in the office of the collector of the second district of New York during Mr. Mason's term of office. In view of the fact that Congressional action must be taken before accounts of Mr. Mason pending in this Department can be adjusted, and the further fact that such action is eminently just and proper, I have the honor to respectfully recommend the speedy passage of the bill for the relief of Mr. Mason, in order that his accounts pending in this Department may be properly adjusted.

Respectfully,
G. W. WILSON,
Commissioner.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman, just a word or two, supplementary to what the gentleman from Illinois has said. Mr. John A. Mason was an internal-revenue collector in one of the districts in New York City. The building in which he had his office was owned by the late Vice-President of the United States, Hon. Levi P. Morton. It was burned, and in the conflagration the stamps of the Government were destroyed. This bill is simply to settle the accounts on the books of the Treasury Department. The Government has substantially lost nothing, but the Treasury Department can not settle the matter of the stamp account until this bill passes. That Department has recommended the passage of this bill, the committee has unanimously reported it to the House, and it is in all respects unobjectionable. There can be no objection to it, and it should pass without division. I am familiar with the matter, and if anyone desires more information I will be glad to give it.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

F. R. LAUSON.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 807) for the relief of F. R. Lauson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to issue to F. R. Lauson, of Tionesta, Pa., a duplicate of United States 4 per cent bond No. 10044, the original having been burned; but before issuing said duplicate bond the Secretary of the Treasury shall take from said Lauson a bond in the sum of $300, with two satisfactory sureties, conditioned to indemnify the United States against said original bond No. 10044, and all claims therein.

The following amendment recommended by the committee was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to issue to F. R. Lanson, Tionesta, Pa., a duplicate in lieu of a United States 4 per cent coupon bond, funded loan of 1907, No. 10044, for $100, with interest coupons attached dated January 1, 1887, and subsequently, said bond and interest coupons alleged to have been destroyed: Provided, That the said F. R. Lanson shall first file in the Treasury a bond in the penal sum of double the amount of the destroyed bond and the interest thereon from January 1, 1887, to the date of its maturity, with good and sufficient sureties, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, with condition to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any claim on account of the said destroyed bond and interest coupons."

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

PATRICK NOLAN.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 6443) for the relief of Patrick Nolan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Patrick Nolan, of Newport, R. I., the sum of $34.20, in full compensation for damages caused to the property of said Nolan by a runaway team belonging to the United States Government on November 6, 1899.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, in this case the amount is small; but I think there ought to be some reasons stated for paying even that amount. A man is not always responsible for damages done by a runaway team.

Mr. GRAFF. I have the report here, and it will probably delight the gentleman to know that the report is six pages long, and that there is a letter here from the Secretary of War, and from the claimant, from Capt. Charles G. Treat, captain, Second Artillery, and from Capt. W. P. Stone, captain, Seventh Artillery. The claim has gone through all the various military channels.

Mr. PAYNE. Does any of this mass of evidence show any carelessness or negligence on the part of any agent or servant of the United States?

Mr. GRAFF. I will read you the letter of Capt. W. P. Stone, which appears in the correspondence of the War Department:

LIGHT BATTERY C, SEVENTH ARTILLERY,
Fort Adams, R. I., November 24, 1899.

Respectfully returned to the adjutant.

On November 6, 1899, Corpl. John McKenzie, Light Battery C, drove a team to Newport to take to the station the box of Private Low, of this battery, who had been transferred to the Signal Corps and ordered to Fort Myer.

After Private Low had gotten out of the wagon and his box had been removed, and while Corporal McKenzie was in his seat and holding the reins, the team bolted from a halt. One of the lines got caught, probably under the end of the pole, and broke. Corporal McKenzie fell from his seat, but continued to hold the lines, allowing himself to be dragged for more than a block, when he succeeded in stopping the team. Corporal McKenzie borrowed a pair of lines and returned the team to the post, reporting on arrival to me and relating the facts as above stated. He was considerably bruised and shaken, but wanted to return immediately to town to return the borrowed lines and report to the owner of the damaged property. He did so, but could not find the owner of the property.

He has been on furlough since November 15, and will be in Topeka, Kans., from November 26, for about fifteen days, as a witness in a case before the United States circuit court. I was satisfied from Corporal McKenzie's statement, on account of his character, which is excellent in every respect, that he had done his full duty and was in no way to be blamed for the accident, and so informed him at the time.

On receipt of the inclosed letter from W. H. Mowrey I publicly commended Corporal McKenzie to the battery for his bravery and devotion to duty. From the circumstances and the soldier's uniform carefulness and efficiency, I conclude that there was no fault or negligence on his part.

W. P. STONE,
Captain, Seventh Artillery, Commanding Battery.

I had not the pleasure of being at the meeting of the committee at which this bill was reported. It was reported by Mr. OTEY. So far as the amount of damages is concerned, the War Department made a thorough examination of it, and there appears a three-page affidavit as to the items in the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. I was not asking about the amount. I was only trying to have it ascertained whether the Government was in any way liable. What the gentleman has read so far goes to show that it was not.

Mr. GRAFF. I was not there, and I will leave the consideration of the bill to the House.

Mr. PAYNE. There does not seem to be any reason for paying that small bill, so far as the report shows.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

STANLEY & PATTERSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11591) for the relief of Stanley & Patterson, and to authorize a pay director of the United States Navy to issue a duplicate check.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas it appears that Henry M. Denniston, pay director in the United States Navy, did, on the 5th day of February, 1901, make and issue a check, numbered 458714, bearing date of the said 5th day of February, 1901, upon the assistant treasurer of the United States at New York, in favor of Stanley &

Patterson, for the sum of $2,680.21, being in payment for electrical supplies furnished the United States Navy Department; and

Whereas said check was, on the said 5th day of February, 1901, mailed by the said Henry M. Denniston to Stanley & Patterson, at 32 Frankfort street, New York City, N. Y., and was lost in transmission through the mails and has never been received by the said Stanley & Patterson; and

Whereas the provision of the act of February 16, 1885, amending section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States, authorizing United States disbursing officers and agents to issue duplicates of lost checks, apply only to checks drawn for $2,500 or less: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That said Henry M. Denniston, or his successor in office, be, and hereby is, instructed to issue a duplicate of said original check to Stanley & Patterson, under such regulations in regard to its issuing and payment as have been prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury for the issuing of duplicate checks under the provision of section 3646, Revised Statutes of the United States.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose the usual safeguard in the way of bonds is provided for in this bill.

Mr. TOMPKINS of New York. It provides for the giving of bond?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, sir.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

AARON VAN CAMP AND VIRGINIUS P. CHAPIN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1114) for the relief of the heirs of Aaron Van Camp and Virginius P. Chapin.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of Aaron Van Camp and Virginius P. Chapin against the United States (Congressional case No. 1049), the findings of fact in which were transmitted to the House of Representatives by House Miscellaneous Document No. 81, Fifty-first Congress, second session, is hereby referred to the Court of Claims, to hear and determine the question of the liability of the United States for the losses found by said court in its said sixth finding of fact, with jurisdiction to hear and determine the same upon the principles of law and equity and in compliance with the rules and regulations of said court.

And in the event the said court shall be of the opinion that the United States are justly liable, under all the circumstances of the said case, for the losses and damages sustained by the said decedents by reason of the acts of their officers in the premises, the said court shall render judgment in favor of the claimants for the amount found to be due by its sixth finding of fact in the said Congressional case No. 1049, as set forth in the report of the said court to the Speaker of the House of Representatives on January 8, 1891: Provided, That no statute of limitations shall be pleaded in bar of the recovery of said claim: And provided further, That in determining the question of the liability of the United States the said court shall consider the testimony submitted to it in the investigation of said Congressional case No. 1049, together with all affidavits, documents, and reports of Congressional committees touching the question of liability of the United States and heretofore filed in any of the departments of the Government; also the reports of officers of the State and Treasury Departments of the United States in the settlements of accounts of the officers of the United States in connection with the said claim.

And furthermore, that if the judgment shall be rendered against the United States for the amount found and fixed by said court in said sixth finding of fact, to wit, the sum of $60,100, the same shall be paid, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to the legal representatives of the said Aaron Van Camp, deceased, and the said Virginius P. Chapin, deceased, as their respective interests may appear, and the new action to be brought under the provisions of this act shall be in the name of said legal representatives.

The amendments recommended by the committee were read, as follows:

Strike out the word "justly" in line 2, page 2, and insert "legally." Strike out all between lines 10 and 23 on page 2, commencing with word "Provided," in line 10.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I am a little curious to know what was in this Congressional case No. 1049, recited so often in the bill. I have learned that there is $60,000 in it, and I want to know what else there is in it.

Mr. GRAFF. I must confess, Mr. Chairman, that I am not familiar with the facts in this claim. I was not present when the committee reported the bill. I think the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] made the report, and he is not present at this time.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose it had better be passed over.

Mr. WEEKS. I thought Mr. SALMON made that report.

Mr. GRAFF. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER] made the report. I ask that it may be passed without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the bill just read by the Clerk be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

OFFICERS AND CREW OF THE U. S. S. CHARLESTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5776) for the relief of the officers and crew of the U. S. S. Charleston, lost in the Philippine Islands November 2, 1899.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That to reimburse the officers and crew of the U. S. S. Charleston, destroyed on a coral reef off Camiguin Island, in the Philippines, November 2, 1899, for losses incurred by them, respectively, in the destruction of said vessel, there shall be paid to each of said officers and crew or to the personal representatives of any which may be deceased, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to the losses so sustained by them: Provided, That the accounting officers of the Treasury shall in all cases require a schedule and certificate from each person making a claim under this act, such schedule to be approved by the Secretary of the Navy, who may require other satisfactory proof of said losses, and reimbursements shall be made for such losses as are of a character and value suitable and appropriate to the rank, rating, or duty of the person suffering such loss: Provided, however, That in no case shall the aggregate sum allowed any claimant or person for such loss exceed the amount of twelve months' sea pay (without rations) of the grade or rating held by such person at the time the losses were incurred, and there shall be deducted therefrom any sum heretofore paid any of them under section 290 of the Revised Statutes.

SEC. 2. That the relief granted by the provisions of this act shall be in full satisfaction of any and all claims whatever against the United States on account of losses by the destruction of the U. S. S. Charleston, and any claim which shall be presented and acted upon under the autority of this act shall be held to be finally determined, and shall not in any manner thereafter be reopened, reconsidered, supplemented, nor be subject to appeal in any form.

SEC. 3. That no claim for losses by reason of the destruction of said vessel not heretofore presented shall be allowed under the provisions of this act which shall not be presented within two years after the date of its passage.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

Add as an additional section the following:

"SEC. 4. That any amounts that have been paid under sections 288, 289, and 290 of the Revised Statutes shall be deducted in the settlement of all claims under this act."

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WRIGHT].

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, I would ask for the reading of the report of the committee, which goes into the facts.

The CHAIRMAN. The report will be read as a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The report (by Mr. SALMON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5776) for the relief of the officers and crew of the U. S. S. Charleston, lost in the Philippine Islands November 2, 1899, beg leave to submit the following report and recommend that said bill do pass with an amendment:

This is a bill enacting that to reimburse the officers and crew of the U. S. S. Charleston, destroyed on a coral reef off Camiguin Island, in the Philippines, November 2, 1899, for losses incurred by them, respectively, in the destruction of said vessel, there shall be paid to each of said officers and crew, or to the personal representatives of any who may be deceased, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, a sum equal to the losses so sustained by them.

The facts regarding the losses referred to are as follows: On November 2, 1899, about 6 p. m., this ship, Charleston, was wrecked upon an uncharted reef about 12 miles off Camiguin Island, in the Philippines. The charts and sailing directions furnished the captain of the vessel indicated that there was a clear channel 6 miles in width at the point where the accident occurred. The vessel had a large hole opened in the bottom by striking the reef and the in-rushing water quickly put out the fires, so that there was no steam to run the dynamos, thus making complete darkness below deck. This, together with the short time allowed the officers and crew for getting the boats launched and getting away from the fast-sinking ship, prevented them from securing their clothing and other property.

The Charleston was lost by reason of imperfect charts furnished its officers. These charts were furnished by the Government through the Bureau of Navigation, and, while being the best then to be had, were misleading, and by reason thereof the officers and men sustained a loss which your committee believes should be borne by the Government instead of by the unfortunate individuals.

A court of inquiry to examine into the matter of the loss of the Charleston was convened, which reported that the evidence before it showed that every precaution was taken to insure the safety of the vessel against accident; that proper lookouts were stationed: leadsmen were in both chains keeping the leads in constant use; that the captain and navigator were on the bridge; that the charts furnished by the Bureau of Navigation showed clear water where the ship struck; and that the sailing directions gave no information of any danger to navigation in that immediate locality, and exonerated the officers from all blame or responsibility for the accident.

A bill similar to the one under consideration was introduced during the last Congress and referred to the Committee on Claims, but owing to the lateness of the term when the same was introduced no report was made by the committee.

The following communications from the Secretary of the Navy regarding the loss of the Charleston have been received by your committee:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 18, 1902.

SIR: The Department is in receipt of your letter of the 15th instant, inclosing copy of bill (H. R. 5755) "for the relief of the officers and crew of the U. S. S. Charleston, lost in the Philippine Islands November 2, 1899," and requesting to be furnished with the facts as determined by the court of inquiry and such other information in its possession which may be deemed pertinent to a careful consideration of this matter.

In reply I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of a letter dated February 7, 1901, addressed to the chairman of the Committee on Claims, House of Representatives, expressing its views in regard to a similar measure (H. R. 13017), in the Fifty-sixth Congress.

It is learned that claims of some officers and men of the Charleston have been adjusted, and under sections 290 and 288 of the Revised Statutes have been paid—to officers one month's pay and to enlisted men $60. It is therefore suggested that the proposed measure be amended by providing that the amounts which have been paid to persons in the naval service under said sections, or to their heirs under section 289, shall be deducted in the settlement of all claims under this act.

A form of an additional section, to be added at the end of the bill for this purpose, is transmitted herewith.

The report of the court of inquiry convened to inquire into the circumstances attending the loss of the Charleston has been bound with a number of other records into a large volume, which will be sent to your committee at such time as may suit its convenience, in charge of an official from this Department, who will aid it in its examination.

Very respectfully,

JNO. D. LONG,
Secretary.

Hon. JOSEPH V. GRAFF,
Chairman Committee on Claims, House of Representatives.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 7, 1901.

SIR: Referring to the bill (H. R. 13017) "for the relief of the officers and crew of the U. S. S. Charleston, lost in the Philippines November 2, 1899," and to your request of the 5th instant for facts, information, and opinion in regard to the merits of the case, I have the honor to state that the Charleston, while on passage from Kasiguran to San Pio V., Kamiguin, Philippine Islands, on the morning of November 2, 1899, ran upon an unmarked and unknown shoal and was lost. The court of inquiry, convened by order of the commander in chief of the naval force on Asiatic station to inquire into the circumstances connected with the loss by grounding of the Charleston, found, inter alia, that every precaution required by the United States Navy Regulations was taken by the commanding officer to insure the safety of the vessel under his command against accident, and in its opinion no blame or responsibility for the accident to the vessel should be attributed to the officers and crew.

The commanding officer of the Charleston, in his report dated November 28, 1899, to the commander in chief, states: "I regretted very much the necessity for anybody to leave personal effects behind, but as the boats were deeply laden with the crew, arms, and ammunition, and provisions, and had about 18 miles to go, most of it in the open sea, I considered it necessary. The officers and crew deserve the greatest commendation for faithful and zealous work at this time, and their readiness to cheerfully leave personal effects." The circumstances, other than those hereinafter mentioned, attending the loss of the Charleston were such as would, under the provisions of the act approved March 2, 1895, entitle the officers and crew to reimbursement for the loss of their personal effects.

The Comptroller of the Treasury, in a decision dated January 22, 1901, held that as the Charleston was at the time of her loss engaged in cooperation with the land forces of the United States in the suppression of a local insurrection in the Philippine Islands, reimbursement for losses could not be made under the act by reason of its second proviso, "that this act shall not apply to losses sustained in time of war."

As the bill follows the lines of the general law on the subject of losses, and is similar to the act of March 30, 1898, to reimburse the survivors of officers and crew of the Maine for losses incurred by them, the Department perceives no objection to the bill and commends it to the favorable consideration of the committee.

Very respectfully,

JOHN D. LONG,
Secretary.

Hon. JOSEPH V. GRAFF,
Chairman Committee on Claims, House of Representatives.

Your committee have added, by way of amendment, a fourth section, as suggested by the Secretary of the Navy, and with this amendment recommend that the bill do pass.

Mr. WRIGHT. Mr. Chairman, the wreck of the Charleston was caused by imperfect charts. The officers supposed they had some 5 miles leeway, and this bill remunerates the officers and crew for the loss incurred in that wreck. I think the precedent has been established in the matter of the wreck of the Tallapoosa and several other vessels, and unless other gentlemen desire to debate the bill I shall ask for a vote.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, before this bill is voted on I want to make a few suggestions, if the gentleman yields the floor. I do not care to ask any questions. I want the floor to make a few suggestions before a vote is taken on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from California.

Mr. LOUD. The gentleman from Georgia wants to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. That is a matter for the gentleman to decide.

Mr. MADDOX. Let the gentleman proceed.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, some years ago I had some experience upon the Committee on Claims. At that time there were large accumulations of claims of this character which caused the committee some annoyance, because, I think, they wanted to do justice to the Government and justice to the men. My memory on the subject is—and if I am not correct I hope the Chairman will correct me—at that time we framed a law, or an amendment to a law that had been in existence for some years, fixing the amount of money which the officers might recover on account of the loss of a war vessel at sea. It is apparent from the reading of this bill that the officers and men of this ship have been paid the full limit of the law, and here is an attempt, an attempt made many times before, Mr. Chairman, sometimes successfully and other times unsuccessfully, but an attempt is made here to override a law that Congress many times has considered, because it became necessary for Congress to protect the Government against the actions of the officers of the Department.

Now, the only limitation put upon the amount of money allowed here is one year's sea pay. I do not know how much that may amount to in this case; but in some cases it might amount to twelve or thirteen thousand dollars. Now, then, by the passage of the law limiting the amount of allowance that may be made to officers and seamen, certain regulations prescribe the amount of clothing the officers and men shall and must have, and while it is not specifically in the law, yet it is generally understood that no officer or man shall take on board ship any more than the law provides that he shall have. Up to the amount of clothing the law permits the officer to have, this law reimburses him.

These officers and men come in after they have exhausted the remedy at law to say, "I had a dress suit costing me $100; I had five dress suits; I had two dozen white shirts which cost $4 or $5 apiece;" I had this and that. You will see that a natural sympathy exists between one officer and another who must adjudicate these claims; you permit in this bill the allowance to a commander of that vessel—and I assume he was a commander—of $3,000 or $4,000 for personal wearing apparel. After Congress has spent so much time in the past in endeavoring to frame a law, and has framed a law, to reimburse every officer and man for everything he should have on the ship, I do not believe Congress should make an exception in this case.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. Do I understand you that the law has limited the liability of the Government to officers and seamen as to loss of clothing?

Mr. LOUD. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. And this is for the excess?

Mr. LOUD. Yes. Evidently they have gone to the Department and got all the law permits them to have, and the law permits them to be reimbursed for all that is necessary for them to have at sea, all that they should have.

Mr. SHAFROTH. How much is that?

Mr. LOUD. I can not say. I took part in framing the bill when the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] was chairman of the committee. I will say that we took carefully into consideration every article that every officer and man should have upon that vessel while at sea.

Mr. GRAFF. Will the gentleman yield to me a minute?

Mr. LOUD. Yes; certainly. I do not want to do an injustice to anyone.

Mr. GRAFF. I would not have the gentleman from California give a false idea of what this bill is.

Mr. LOUD. I do not mean to.

Mr. GRAFF. I want to suggest that the bill does say that the losses shall be of such a character and value as are suitable and appropriate to the rank, rating, and duty of the person offering such loss.

Mr. LOUD. I understand all that.

Mr. GRAFF. There is a limitation as to the amount.

Mr. LOUD. Yes; a year's sea pay. I do not think I have misstated anything. I want to state again to the gentleman that the committee at that time had this measure under consideration some months, because there was before the committee at that time twenty-five or thirty cases of this kind. In years that have gone by claims have been made in certain cases. As you all know, a case may be passed to-day that will not be passed to-morrow. Exceptions have been made, and the committee realized that it was necessary to lay down a law or a rule whereby these men could be reimbursed.

Mr. GRAFF. I want to say that I am not familiar with the laws pertaining to officers and seamen in the Navy, but I do know that the limitation for losses to those in the Army is practically as follows: Those articles which are useful and necessary in connection with the performance of their duties. That is the existing law with reference to the losses that occur in the Army. It seems to me that is almost the language in this bill as applied to the Navy.

Mr. LOUD. You make the limitations there one year's sea pay; that is, for a commander it might be three or four thousand dollars.

Mr. GRAFF. It does not follow that one year's sea pay is to be the basis.

Mr. LOUD. The result always is that they allow officers all that you permit them to allow. There is that natural sympathy between officers. We considered all these matters and framed a law, and now why not abide by it?

Mr. WRIGHT. Under the general law the man can receive one month's sea pay; that is the general law.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, no; the gentleman is entirely mistaken about that. The gentleman has not got the law. I have not got the law here, but there is an allowance for wearing apparel.

Mr. WRIGHT. That was fixed at a minimum, and any allowance that has been made to them is to be deducted from the amount carried by this bill. It is understood that under the regulations officers have to provide themselves with everything they need while on the voyage, both on sea and on shore. They are obliged to have civilian's clothes when on shore leave and to attend social functions. They also have to have their uniform. This is not a new thing. The officers and crew of the Kearsarge and of the Maine and other vessels have been reimbursed for such losses, so that this is not inaugurating any new policy. The sufferers of the steamship Ashuelot, wrecked in the China Sea, were likewise reimbursed. Similar bills have been passed for the relief of naval officers, giving precisely the same relief as in this bill.

The act of March 2, 1885—the one referred to, I believe, by the gentleman from California—says that the act shall not apply to losses incurred in time of war. Is that the one that the gentleman referred to?

Mr. LOUD. Oh, no.

Mr. WRIGHT. I feel that there would be great injustice done to these people if they were not allowed something for the losses which they incurred; and the limit is placed at one year's pay without rations.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman from California remember the year in which the law was passed?

Mr. LOUD. I do not. I think it was 1894, or before that—perhaps in 1891 or 1892.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. The gentleman thinks it was prior to 1894?

Mr. LOUD. That would be my recollection; I can not speak positively, but that is immaterial. I say that these men have received all that the law allows them. I will say, too, that a month's pay, I think, is as much as they ought to have.

Mr. GRAFF. Let me say that these losses unfortunately occurred in such a manner that the claims arising therefrom could not come under the general law with reference to losses. I will read a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, embraced in the report:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, February 7, 1901.

SIR: Referring to the bill (H. R. 13017) "for the relief of the officers and crew of the U. S. S. Charleston, lost in the Philippines November 2, 1899," and to your request of the 5th instant for facts, information, and opinion in regard to the merits of the case, I have the honor to state that the Charleston, while on passage from Kasiguran to San Pio V., Kamiguin, Philippine Islands, on the morning of November 2, 1899, ran upon an unmarked and unknown shoal and was lost.

The court of inquiry, convened by order of the commander in chief of the naval force on Asiatic station to inquire into the circumstances connected with the loss by grounding of the Charleston, found, inter alia, that every precaution required by the United States Navy Regulations was taken by the commanding officer to insure the safety of the vessel under his command against accident, and in its opinion no blame or responsibility for the accident to the vessel should be attributed to the officers and crew.

The commanding officer of the Charleston, in his report dated November 28, 1899, to the commander in chief, states: "I regretted very much the necessity for anybody to leave personal effects behind, but as the boats were deeply laden with the crew, arms, and ammunition, and provisions, and had about 18 miles to go, most of it in the open sea, I considered it necessary. The officers and crew deserve the greatest commendation for faithful and zealous work at this time, and their readiness to cheerfully leave personal effects."

The circumstances, other than those hereinafter mentioned, attending the loss of the Charleston were such as would, under the provisions of the act approved March 2, 1895, entitle the officers and crew to reimbursement for the loss of their personal effects.

That is the very act to which the gentleman has referred.

The Comptroller of the Treasury, in a decision dated January 22, 1901, held that as the Charleston was at the time of her loss engaged in cooperation with the land forces of the United States in the suppression of a local insurrection in the Philippine Islands, reimbursement for losses could not be made under the act by reason of its second proviso, "that this act shall not apply to losses sustained in time of war."

So that the act to which the gentleman has referred would not apply to this case; and there is no existing law under which these people can secure recompense for the losses of their effects. The only relief which the Secretary of the Navy has been able to give them was simply one month's pay.

Mr. PAYNE. Why does not the gentleman amend his bill so as simply to place these men under the general law—allowing them to make recovery under that law, notwithstanding the fact that they were engaged in war?

Mr. GRAFF. I am willing this bill should be so amended.

Mr. LOUD. How much has already been paid them?

Mr. GRAFF. Simply one month's pay. Recourse was had to that inadequate remedy simply because there was no existing law applying directly to the case and which would enable the Secretary of the Navy to recompense them for the loss of their personal effects. I have no doubt that the act of March 2, 1895, provides the same thing as is provided in this bill—that reimbursement shall be made only for things necessary in connection with the performance of their duty.

Mr. LOUD. Why should not that act apply to this case?

Mr. GRAFF. I am willing that it should.

Mr. LOUD. No one would object to that.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I understood the gentleman from California to say that the act was passed at the time he was a member of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LOUD. Does it make any difference whether "the gentleman from California" went off that committee in 1894 or in 1895? I do not think that is material.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I do not think it is either. We are simply making an effort to locate the act of Congress.

Mr. GRAFF. Let me read further from this letter of the late Secretary of the Navy:

As the bill follows the lines of the general law on the subject of losses, and is similar to the act of March 30, 1898, to reimburse the survivors of officers and crew of the Maine for losses incurred by them, the Department perceives no objection to the bill and commends it to the favorable consideration of the committee.

The Secretary of the Navy says in effect that this bill follows the lines of the general law on this subject.

Mr. LOUD. It does?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. Was there not special relief in the case of the Maine?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. LOUD. Why should there have been special relief if it came under the general law?

Mr. GRAFF. The gentleman is attempting to confuse me.

Mr. LOUD. No, I do not want to do that.

Mr. GRAFF. The Secretary of the Navy makes two separate propositions. One of them is that this bill we are now considering was framed on the same basis as the general law.

Mr. LOUD. I think the Secretary is mistaken; that is all.

Mr. GRAFF. I presume he means that the method of adjudication of the amount of property to which they will be entitled to be considered is the same under the general law as in the bill we are considering. Then the Secretary of the Navy puts the second proposition, that the bill is framed exactly as was the bill which gave relief to the survivors of the Maine.

Mr. LOUD. It surely would not have required any bill, because there was no war. I do not think the Comptroller held there was a war at the time the Maine was blown up.

Mr. GRAFF. I do not know about that. The bill giving relief to the survivors of the Maine is not before us at the present time.

Mr. MADDOX. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. I understand the gentleman that there has been only one month's pay given to these officers.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. MADDOX. They have not been supplied with it under the law referred to by the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD].

Mr. GRAFF. No; and the Secretary of the Navy says this bill is practically the same as the general law with reference to the adjustment of the amount due to these officers and men.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is, Shall the bill as amended be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The bill as amended was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

WILLIAM R. WHEATON AND CHARLES H. CHAMBERLAIN.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 5113) for the relief of William R. Wheaton and Charles H. Chamberlain, of California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to William R. Wheaton, ex-register, $64.37, and to Charles H. Chamberlain, ex-receiver, of the United States land office at San Francisco, Cal., $108.50, for the amount of money by them paid for services of janitor for the United States land office at San Francisco, Cal., from July 1, 1877, to June 30, 1878, and for the amount of money by them paid for the rent of the United States land office at San Francisco, Cal., for the months of July, August, and September, 1877.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Chairman, that carries the large amount of $64, and I think we would like to hear something about that. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAFF. It is an explanation of man's inhumanity to man. This bill has evidently been thoroughly digested by our committee, there being 42 pages in the report.

Mr. PAYNE. I was about to suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that if he would read the report he would know all about it.

Mr. GRAFF. The report goes on as follows:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5113) for the relief of William R. Wheaton and Charles H. Chamberlain, of California, have had the same under consideration and respectfully submit the following report:

A similar bill was reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Public Lands in the Forty-ninth Congress; also by the same committee and by the Committee on Claims of the House in the Fiftieth Congress; and in the Fifty-first Congress a similar bill was twice passed by both Houses. In the first session it failed because of adjournment, and it was vetoed in the second session. The Senate passed the same notwithstanding the veto of the President, but Congress adjourned before the House could act upon the veto.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be passed without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the bill just read by the Clerk will be passed without prejudice.

There was no objection.

GEORGE RUSHBERGER.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 6642) for the relief of George Rushberger.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $5,000 be paid, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to George Rushberger, of Johnstown, Pa., for discovering and capturing Santa Ana's money at Cerro Gordo, Mexico, 1847.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 9 strike out the words "ten thousand" and insert in lieu thereof the words "five thousand."

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the report in this case is quite a lengthy one. It states all the facts that I could state. It might, perhaps, be well to read it, or that I should have permission to read it in my own time. Yet for the benefit of any gentleman who may have some doubt about the propriety of the bill I will make the following statement:

George Rushberger, according to the account I have of him, has stood around this Capitol, like many another old claimant, for fifty years, presenting to each Congress a claim for certain moneys that he says the Government of the United States owes him. The report shows that at various Congresses action has been taken toward rewarding this man for what the Committee on Claims concluded was a faithful service which he had performed for his Government in turning over to the Government money that he captured from Santa Anna's army many years ago during the war with Mexico. As I have already said, for years this old man has presented to Congress his claim, and the Committee on Claims concluded that it would pass upon his rights and report a bill favorably to the House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Claims was unanimously satisfied on two propositions: First, that the claimant here is the exact George Rushberger who did capture, along with some other soldiers, $200,000 of Santa Anna's money; secondly, the committee was also persuaded and unanimously concluded that this money was turned over to Gen. Winfield S. Scott. It further concluded, and it was not difficult to come to that conclusion, that all this money was not returned to the United States Government, and that the records show that on the day this money was captured ten or twelve thousand dollars was turned over to the quartermaster and returned to the Treasury of the United States, or at least to the Quartermaster's Department, at Washington. He has always claimed that all this money, amounting to $200,000, should have been returned to the Government. With that he had nothing to do, and neither have we.

It is plain the whole amount was not reported to the Government. Here are the facts submitted; and I may say, gentlemen of the committee, that I have no earthly interest in the result except to do what is right. I repeat it was easy for this committee to find that this man had performed some service. The testimony was submitted to us, and from it we adopted this report. I am not breaking any rule of the committee when I say I believe out of the 15 members on the committee there were certainly 13 or 14 present, and that their action was unanimous. We concluded, as the precedent had been established on many occasions of rewarding men for honest performance of their duties, that this old man was as much entitled to his reward as any other person ever claiming a reward of a similar character.

The Supreme Court of the United States has held, in what is known as the sugar-bounty case, that while such a claim is not a debt, it has been recognized time and again that such conduct was a sufficient inducement for reward. During the time that ex-Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, was a member of this House this report says that he made some effort to have this old man compensated. He is a somewhat historical figure in the State of Pennsylvania, and that is one reason why I am interested in having a careful examination made of his claim. The Senate of the United States, as I recollect, from the fact shown by the report, has reported this bill favorably two or three times. Whether the Senate has acted upon it I am unable to state. I have not any further explanation to offer; but I will say to my friend who has risen all the facts I know of are in this report.

Mr. MADDOX. Do I understand the gentleman to say that while $200,000 was captured, only $12,000 was turned in to the Government?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Those are all the facts, I will state to the gentleman from Georgia. It is further said, if my friend will permit me, that this beautiful property north of Washington was purchased by money that this old man and his comrades captured.

Mr. DALZELL. But the $200,000 was turned over?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I am satisfied of that; I may say to the gentleman that it never reached the Quartermaster-General's Department at Washington. This statement is to be considered as no reflection upon the honesty of anybody. I am simply giving the facts as they appeared to us.

Mr. MADDOX. If I understand the gentleman, if he turned over the $200,000 he would have had a claim of the amount set out in the bill.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. As I understand the gentleman from Georgia, old Mr. Rushberger claims that this money that they captured was turned over to their superior officer. The money found in these bags that he turned over amounted to $200,000. If that amount had appeared in the Department at Washington, I assume that, if he is entitled to any reward at all he would have been entitled to the reward now asked. It is proposed to reward him according to the service performed and for his honest way in performing it. As my friend from North Carolina says, this is not a legal question. The proposition is, Will the United States Government, in a case of this kind, reward a man for faithful services? That is all there is in the controversy.

Mr. MADDOX. Do the committee think that this amount was really captured and turned over?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. We have not the slighest doubt about it.

Mr. PAYNE. What evidence is there, any more than the statement of the claimant that he had captured this $200,000 and turned it over? If he had taken $200,000 it would have taken a long time to count that much gold—at least it would have taken me a long time to count it. Certainly the presumption would arise that he should have turned over more than $12,000 of it if he captured that amount.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I would be very much pleased to give the gentleman from New York the benefit of such information as we had. Affidavits have been submitted to the Senate committee. They have been incorporated into the Senate report, made by the committee, and they are from the comrades of the claimant. One of them was John W. McCully, who testified that he was along with Rushberger at the time the money was captured. Further, there are the affidavits of James Russell, Charles W. Mowry, William H. Barker, Charles H. Bryson, and William Brindle. I will say to the gentleman from New York, of course, these questions of fact are determined upon such testimony as is submitted to us, and the testimony of Rushberger corroborated by the evidence of four or five men, whom we assume to be reputable, who say that the money was captured, induced favorable action.

Mr. PAYNE. I did not notice anything showing the amount of this money in any of these affidavits. Now, there is another question I would like to ask.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. There is no testimony except the testimony of Rushberger himself of the amount of money. That is vague and uncertain, but there is testimony which satisfied us and would satisfy my friend from New York that he did turn over between eleven and twelve thousand dollars to the Government, and that much money was reported to the Quartermaster-General.

Mr. PAYNE. I agree with the gentleman on that.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. But, Mr. Chairman, it is a fact, as I believe, I may say, that it has always been understood that there was a certain amount of money brought from Mexico, with which this beautiful property to the north of the city, known as the Soldiers' Home, was bought, the most beautiful part of the city, but I do not know whether it is true or not.

Mr. WARNER. Is it claimed that this man did any more than his duty as a soldier?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. No, sir; it is not.

Mr. PERKINS. How many were there present when this money was captured.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. The report says that he was a sergeant, I think, and there were present three or four others, or there were three or four others who were aware of the capture, if not present.

Mr. PERKINS. Why have not the other men claims, also; why should this man get $10,000 and they get nothing?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I understand these other men are not now living.

Mr. PERKINS. Their heirs will come here; do not be afraid.

Mr. MANN. This man won't be living much longer if he has been here for fifty years.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I do not know whether he has been here all that time, for I have not been here myself.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Was there any report of any officer of the Army in reference to this money at the time it was turned over?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I believe none except what appears in the quartermaster's report saying so much money had been returned.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman quite sure that that officer of the Army returned $12,000 to the Government without making a report as to where it came from and how it was taken?

Mr. BUTLER. There is no report at all. It seems that $11,791.19 appears to have been turned over April 26, 1847.

Mr. MANN. That appears from the records of the War Department?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. From the records of the War Department.

Mr. PERKINS. As I understand it, the committee are willing to allow this man $10,000.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I want to correct the gentleman in that. We reduced the amount in the committee; we cut it in two.

Mr. PERKINS. You make it $5,000?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Yes; we amended the bill by cutting it in two.

Mr. PERKINS. If all the money that was captured was $11,000, you would not think it proper to pay him $5,000 reward, would you? Assuming that he captured $11,000 or $12,000, would the committee pay a soldier $5,000 reward for turning that amount of money over?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. That is a fair question, and I will answer it the best I know how. We assumed that he had captured a much larger sum of money, and we used the sum of $11,791 as a means of identifying the balance of the money.

Mr. PERKINS. Then the committee must necessarily find that he turned over a large sum of money to his superior officers, and they stole that money. That must be the position the committee takes—that the commanding officers received the money which this man had found and turned over to them and embezzled it. It went somewhere.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman put that in the form of a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. What the committee has found they have stated in the report. I do not understand the committee charged anyone with theft.

Mr. PERKINS. Where did they find that the money had gone to?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. For the purchase of the property to which I have referred, and the committee used, as one of the means of reaching that conclusion, the letter written to this old man by ex-Governor Curtin, of Pennsylvania, at the time he and Mr. Samuel J. Randall undertook to have this man recompensed for his services.

Mr. PERKINS. Who bought the property? I know nothing about it. It seems to be a serious matter to charge here that officers of the United States in the Mexican war received $50,000 or $100,000 and stole it, and on the basis of that finding allow this man $5,000 for finding money which we must conclude was dishonestly used. I do not want to vote for it without I know the facts.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I do not want anybody to vote for it. I am stating the facts as my duty compels me to do. I do not charge anybody with having stolen anything. The gentleman from New York may in his technical way, but he knows, and I know, that it has always been understood that that property which I have referred to was purchased with money that came from Santa Ana's army.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not know it at all. I am ignorant of the facts.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I refer to the Soldiers' Home.

Mr. CLARK. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK. On what kind of a basis does the gentleman come to the conclusion that a soldier ought to be paid a premium on property that he gets from the enemy and pays over to the United States?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. There is, of course, no legal liability. It is sometimes done. I am told, I do not vouch for it, that property has at times been taken—I have heard of it—and has neither been turned over to the Government as it should have been nor returned to parties from whom it was taken after hostilities ceased.

Mr. CLARK. But one wrong does not justify another.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Honest men who return property are always rewarded if the party that owns it is liberal.

Mr. CLARK. It is the soldier's business to capture the enemy's property; that is what he is there for. Suppose this bill passes—and it is the first I ever heard of—this is made a precedent, and every soldier in the United States Army that captured any property from somebody through the civil war comes in here and files a claim for reward. How much do you suppose it would amount to?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman put that as a question for me to answer?

Mr. CLARK. Well, you can guess it off, or you need not answer it at all. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Then let the gentleman answer his own question. I do not know what the House would do.

Mr. CLARK. If this man is entitled to his percentage as a collector of this money, every man that served in the Federal Army during the civil war and captured any property and turned it over to the Government would be equally entitled to his commission or percentage.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. The gentleman is able to answer that question for himself.

Mr. CLARK. I want the gentleman to answer it.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I suppose so.

Mr. CLARK. Let me ask the gentleman still another question. If that is true, then are not the soldiers who captured property over in China during the late "ruction" there—are they not——

A MEMBER. They have not turned it over.

Mr. CLARK. But they ought to be made to turn it over, and the Government ought to be made to return it to the people from whom it was taken.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. The gentleman from North Carolina has answered that question. Those soldiers have never turned that property over to the Government.

Mr. CLARK. They ought to be made to do so.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I have no way of making them turn it over to the Government. [Laughter.] I am talking about this claim, which I have presented here by the unanimous authority of the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MADDOX. Let me say that property amounting to about $48,000,000 was turned into the Treasury as "captured and abandoned property," and about eleven millions of that was captured by the United States troops. Now, if we start out with this precedent——

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Does the gentleman refer to property captured during the war with Mexico?

Mr. MADDOX. No; the civil war. The United States troops captured that property and it is in the Treasury now. If we start out with a precedent of this sort, where are we going to end?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Was that property in cash?

Mr. MADDOX. It was "captured and abandoned property." It was so entered on the books.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Would it have to be converted into cash?

Mr. MADDOX. It is already converted into cash, long ago.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Of course, this case may set a precedent; I am not here to say it will not. I have tried to say half a dozen times that I present the facts as they are. I have never yet been afraid of committing myself to any proposition which I thought right, because I apprehended I might afterwards be confronted with it as a precedent. I believe that every case ought to stand on its own merits.

Mr. MADDOX. How many other men were with this man when he was captured?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I have already answered that question two or three times; there were four or five. The gentleman from New York says there were more. I have said there were four or five, and I say so still. I may say, further, that if I have misstated the facts I shall be glad to have the gentleman from New York show my error.

Let me say to my friend from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] that I am not here urging any person to vote for this claim. I think it should be settled. I am making, as instructed by the committee, the best argument that I know how to make in favor of the claim. [Laughter and applause.]

Several MEMBERS. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. I was authorized to present this to the House for consideration.

Mr. BOWERSOCK. Is this soldier a pensioner?

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Yes; he has been drawing a pension. He is pensioned as a soldier of the Mexican war. We had an examination of the record made. In that way we were able to identify him as having been in General Scott's army.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if anybody wants to ask any further questions——

Mr. PAYNE. Just one question. In view of the fact that the gentleman is not able to cite any precedent of a private bill similar to this; in view of the fact that Congress has never, from the foundation of the Government, passed any general law giving prize money to the Army, and in view of the further fact that Congress has recently by an overwhelming vote repealed all laws giving prize money to officers and men in the naval service, does not the gentleman think he had better withdraw this bill for repairs. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. No, Mr. Chairman. Let me say to the gentleman from New York that while there will be no prize money paid hereafter under the law, it is a fact that all men who performed service similar to that of this old man have been already provided for. I say to the gentleman further that there is precedent for the allowance of such a claim as this; and as I endeavored to state in the first part of my argument, that was one of the things that induced us to make a favorable report on this claim. Now, I am willing that the House should dispose of it as it deems proper.

The question being taken on the amendment reported by the committee, it was agreed to.

The question being taken, Shall the bill as amended be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House? it was decided in the negative.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. What effect has that on the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. The bill will remain on the Calendar.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the bill be reported with a recommendation that the enacting clause be struck out.

The motion of Mr. PAYNE was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that only such bills be taken up hereafter during the remaining three-quarters of an hour as are represented by members present on the floor of the House now.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for information as to whether or not that would cut out Senate bills. There is one Senate bill here that I would like to see passed upon.

Mr. HILL. Well, if the member refers to Senate bills, all right. I represent a Senate bill here myself.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. I object, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made by the gentleman from New York.

F. Y. RAMSAY.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 11273) to pay F. Y. Ramsay, heir at law and distributee of the late Joseph Ramsay, $430.42, for balance due the said Joseph Ramsay as collector of customs and superintendent of lights in the district of Plymouth, N. C.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Treasurer of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to pay, out of any funds in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $430.42 to F. Y. Ramsay, heir at law and distributee of the late Joseph Ramsay, being balance due the said Joseph Ramsay, deceased, as collector of customs and superintendent of lights in the district of Plymouth, N. C., from March 1, 1859, to April 30, 1861.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, I am getting curious about these bills, and I would like to know about this one.

Mr. GRAFF. The facts can be shown in this case by a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, which I will read:

SIR: Referring to your communication of the 12th instant, making inquiry regarding a claim due to Mr. Joseph Ramsay as collector of customs at Plymouth, N. C., about April, 1861, in the sum of $430.42, I have the honor to advise you that an examination of the books of the office of the Auditor for this Department shows that there appears to be due the above-named person, under settlement report No. 23978, the sum of $430.42.

Your attention is invited to section 3480, Revised Statutes of the United States, under which it would seem payment of this and similar claims by the Department is prohibited.

L. M. SHAW, Secretary.

I now yield to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN].

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, this claim is for the balance due, as appears on the books of the Treasury Department, for services of Mr. Joseph Ramsay, deceased, as collector of customs at the port of Plymouth, N. C.—for services rendered prior to 1861, found to be due on the books of the Treasury Department.

Mr. GRAFF. What provision of the statute is it that this has reference to?

Mr. CLAUDE KITCHIN. After the war a statute was passed which prohibited any officer of the Government paying any demand or claim to any person who was not loyal to the Union, if that claim arose prior to April 13, 1861. Joseph Ramsay performed these services from 1840 to 1861, and the only reason the Department did not pay it was because of this statute which prohibited such demand being paid to any person unless he showed that he was loyal to the Union during the war. This gentleman could not do that. He took no part in the war, but he could not and did not attempt to show that he was loyal to the Union. The money is due him, admitted by the Treasury Department, and we thought it ought to be paid, and ought to have been paid long ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Chairman, I was not able to get the statute of March 2, 1895, to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF] referred a short time ago. That is in relation to this relief of the Charleston. I will not read all the act. I will state that the liability of the Government under this act shall be limited to such claims of personal property as are required by the necessary naval regulations. Notwithstanding the gentleman assumed to say that the statement from some department official that this bill was in accordance with that law, at that time I took occasion to contradict him without knowing the fact.

Now, I contradict it, knowing that the statement was absolutely false. The limitation put in that bill was one year's pay. The limitation here is to such personal property as is required, and that is the relief that ought to have been granted in this case, I believe very foolishly denied by the decision of the Comptroller that it was a time of war, and I want to call attention to the fact that the position I assumed was correct. There has been a misrepresentation to the House, not by the gentleman, but by the Department. They have here placed the limitation in the bill so high that they can relieve the officers and crew of the Charleston in an amount five or six times as large as they could have recovered if they had been paid under the law of March 2, 1895.

Mr. GRAFF. But the bill confines the amount to be paid to the losses actually incurred up to that minute.

Mr. LOUD. Yes; but it is not paid them under this statute. The bill is very cunningly drawn; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, I call for the regular order.

Mr. LOUD. Oh, well; the gentleman will get along just as fast without being too much in a hurry. I only desire to correct the statement I made.

Mr. GRAFF. I move that the bill before the House at the present time be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. PAYNE. Before that is done I want to suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF] that he ought to correct the action that was taken through the false impression that the committee obtained from the letter from the Navy Department. The committee was given to understand that this bill which was laid aside was in exact terms the same as under the general law. If that is not done, I hope the House will kill the bill when they get it into the House.

Mr. GRAFF. I base my information on the letter of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. PAYNE. Certainly; I know that.

Mr. GRAFF. I am willing that the bill should be amended so as to provide that such losses shall be estimated upon the basis of property allowed to these officers under the Navy Regulations, and if the gentleman from California [Mr. LOUD] will prepare an amendment while we are discussing these other bills, for myself I guarantee to him that I will have no objection to it. But the present bill is not involved in this discussion, and I ask that it be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

HENRY C. NIELDS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9867) for the relief of the estate of Henry C. Nields, deceased.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the estate of Henry C. Nields, deceased, late lieutenant-commander in the United States Navy, the sum of $960, the difference between other duty and sea pay, for service on the receiving ship Potomac from December 2, 1870, to December 26, 1870, and from September 14, 1874, to January 12, 1877, which sum was adjusted and allowed by the Auditor for the Navy Department January 10, 1889.

Mr. GRAFF. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, I would be very glad to answer any question asked. This bill is for the relief of Mrs. Nields and her children. Gentlemen of the committee will pardon me for saying that I requested permission to make the report on this bill, and I requested it because this widow and her children live in my town and I am very well acquainted with them and I personally know their worthiness. Lieutenant-Commander Nields was perhaps one of the most distinguished sailors from eastern Pennsylvania. I had set out in the report as a matter of history his wonderful performance in Mobile Bay, while that does not bear upon the facts in this case, nor would I have asked the committee to report favorably on this claim by reason of it.

The committee reported this bill to allow the sum of $960, the difference between other duty and sea pay. Under a ruling of the Supreme Court of the United States he was entitled to that difference in pay, but he did not present his claim, as we find, because he was away off at sea when this ruling of the Supreme Court was made. He came home and died shortly after. His widow did not discover that he was entitled to it until 1886 or 1888; and when she made an effort to obtain it, it was found to be necessary to do so by a special bill. I introduced the bill for her relief. Let me say, gentlemen of the committee, that it was supposed, and I do not wish to make any reflection upon anybody, that the bill had been introduced by my predecessors in Congress.

There was no doubt sensible reasons assigned for the failure. I certainly hope there will be no objection to this claim. The Secretary of the Navy says, in substance, the estate is entitled to the money. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that the sailor was entitled to the difference in pay between an officer performing shore duty and one performing sea service. I would be very much pleased to answer any question that any gentleman may desire to ask, but to avoid detaining the committee and to get along with the business, I will ask that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The bill was ordered to be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

MORGAN'S LOUISIANA AND TEXAS RAILROAD AND STEAMSHIP COMPANY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4636) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to adjust the accounts of Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company for transporting the United States mails.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to state an account with Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company for transporting the United States mails over postal routes Nos. 30003 and 149003 during the period between July 1, 1878, and February 21, 1892, both inclusive, in which he shall credit said company with nonland-grant rates over that portion of its route between New Orleans and Morgan City, La., in accordance with the decision of the Court of Claims in case No. 15877, and shall pay to said company, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum as shall remain due upon such adjustment.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, the facts in this case are these: Under the law, for any services rendered by a railroad to the various departments there shall be a 20 per cent deduction made for that portion of the railroad which is land-grant right of way over which the article passes in transportation. For a number of years the United States Government had entered up against this railroad company a certain number of miles of railroad as a land-grant road, and deductions made proportionately from the contract rates of transportation. The railroad company finally prosecuted claims for these deductions in the Court of Claims, and it was decided that the United States Government had no right to make this deduction for this portion of the right of way, because it was not a land-grant right of way.

The facts were that the United States had given to this railroad a right of way, under the provision, however, that the road must be completed within ten years. The road failed to complete its railway within the ten years, and the land grant was forfeited. The road was compelled to go ahead afterwards and pay for its right of way, and condemn it in the usual way. This bill is simply for the purpose of having the Department adjudicate that portion of the claim which the Court of Claims did not pass upon because it was barred by the statute of limitations.

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to state an account with Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company for transporting the United States mails over postal routes Nos. 30003 and 149003 during the period between July 1, 1878, and February 21, 1892, both inclusive, in which he shall credit said company with nonland-grant rates over that portion of its route between New Orleans and Morgan City, La., in accordance with the decision of the Court of Claims in case No. 15877, and shall pay to said company, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sum as shall remain due upon such adjustment.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand this company settled with the Government annually at least for fourteen years, and took up what balance they had, and it is to be assumed that they gave a receipt in full to the Government.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes, sir; I suppose that is true.

Mr. PAYNE. I suppose it was twenty years before they discovered the facts that some time must have appeared—if it was a fact—that this was not a land-grant road because the land grant had been forfeited and they had been compelled to buy by condemnation proceedings.

Mr. GRAFF. They obtain no benefit by reason of the land grant.

Mr. PAYNE. It is a most remarkable case. How much does it involve?

Mr. GRAFF. Between $23,000 and $24,000, or thereabouts.

Mr. MADDOX. How does the statute of limitation run in this case?

Mr. GRAFF. It does in this case, as I remember; six years is the period of limitation.

Mr. MADDOX. Why should they want to come to Congress now and ask to be relieved of the effects of the statute of limitation? Was the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States made before they were barred or was the decision made after they were barred?

Mr. GRAFF. Of course, they had commenced their suit. They perhaps did not know whether they would be able to recover at all until the final adjudication would determine what their rights were under the law, and in the meantime the statute of limitations was running, and when the case was finally decided, why, they were not able to recover for anything prior to six years before the commencement of the suit.

Mr. PAYNE. It seems that they waited about twenty years before they began.

Mr. GRAFF. There is nothing unusual about removing the statute of limitations.

Mr. MADDOX. There is something unusual about it. I know of thousands of claims that would be here before Congress now if it was not for the statute of limitations, claims fully as just as this; and if you are going to remove the statute of limitations in this instance, we will ask you to remove it in others.

Mr. GRAFF. There is hardly a case that comes before Congress that we are not asked to remove the statute of limitations in regard to it.

Mr. MADDOX. If there was any equitable cause or reason why we should allow these parties to come into court, it might put a different look on it, but I take it that there was nothing to keep them from claiming their rights at any time, and if the statute of limitations means anything it ought to apply to this case.

Mr. GRAFF. These parties had deducted from their contract constantly the amount of transportation over this portion of the road, because it was claimed that it was a land-grant road. It turned out by the decision of the Supreme Court that this railroad had wrongfully withheld from it through the United States this sum of money. This matter was adjudicated——

Mr. MADDOX. Let me cite the gentleman some cases. If you pay this bill, let me show you what is liable to come up. In 1869 and 1870 this Congress passed a law taxing all cotton raised in the South 1¼ or 2 cents a pound. That law was clearly unconstitutional, and the case was brought to the court in which it was so decided. But by the time this case was decided all these parties were barred by the statute of limitations. Now, if there is any reason why we should come in here and relieve this railroad company of the statute of limitations, in the name of high heaven, why shouldn't these people have a right to come here and ask that the statute of limitations be removed and they get the money that was taken from them by the Government unlawfully, and so decided by the late income-tax decision. It is as clear as a noonday sun.

Mr. GRAFF. I will read a portion of this report, which will show why the parties seek this relief:

The claimant, Morgan's Louisiana and Texas Railroad and Steamship Company, operated said road between New Orleans, La., and Morgan City, La., a distance of 80.37 miles, and have, since July 1, 1878, been carrying the United States mails over its road, under regulations made with the Postmaster-General. During this time it received for transporting such mails only 80 per cent of the statutory price, that being the price paid to land-grant companies, the 20 per cent having been withheld because it was alleged that it was a land-grant road, and it was so treated in its payment by the United States.

Said company, claiming that it was entitled to full nonland-grant rates for carrying the mails, on the 5th day of June, 1888, commenced an action in the Court of Claims against the United States for the purpose of recovering the 20 per cent which it claimed it was entitled to receive for carrying the mails over the lines of this road for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1882, 1883, and 1884.

No action was taken on this petition until during the year 1898. On the 21st day of February, 1898, the claimant filed a supplemental petition alleging that it was entitled to the 20 per cent withheld by the Government, or, in other words, that it was entitled to compensation for carrying the mails at nonland-grant rates from July 1, 1878, to December 31, 1897.

On the original petition, filed June 5, 1888, and the supplemental petition of February 21, 1898, the court, after hearing and trial, made a return in that case of a finding of law and fact, a copy of which is appended to this report and made a part of it.

By that decision it was determined by the court that the road was a nonland-grant road, and that the claimant was entitled to recover for carrying the mails at full contract prices allowed to nonland-grant roads, and that it was therefore entitled to recover the 20 per cent of compensation that had been retained by the Post-Office Department, but, the original petition in that case only having claimed compensation for the years 1882, 1883, and 1884, gave judgment for the claimant for the sum of $6,348.04, the amount still due the company for those years; and the supplemental petition having been filed more than ten years after the original petition, the court further held that it only had jurisdiction on the supplemental petition to determine the amount due the claimants for the six years immediately preceding the filing of the said supplemental petition, and on that basis gave judgment for the plaintiff for the sum of $22,396.79 as additional compensation due for the six years from February 21, 1892, up to December 31, 1897, leaving undetermined the additional compensation due the claimants for all that period from July 1, 1878, up to February 21, 1892, except for the years 1882, 1883, and 1884, which were adjudicated under the litigation on the original petition filed in said case, on the ground that the same were barred by the statute of limitations.

Mr. SULZER. This is a unanimous report from the committee, is it not?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes. Now, I am not in favor of giving any greater rights to railroad companies than to a private individual, but there is not a single claim scarcely, I venture to say, that is considered in this Congress that, if the statute of limitations of six years was applied to it so that the statute would begin to run immediately after the claim became due, would not have to be turned out without relief.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman from Illinois say that people make no effort to get their claims allowed within six years of the time they accrue? Ordinarily, does the gentleman mean to say that in all these claims cases that come before his committee the claimant allows more than six years to go by before anything is done?

Mr. GRAFF. Oh, I suppose they do make some effort.

Mr. MANN. The only method of getting relief in ordinary cases is through Congress; but in this case the parties had a right to obtain relief through the courts.

Mr. GRAFF. There are hundreds of bills passed by this Congress authorizing the sending of claims to the Court of Claims for adjudication and waiving the statute of limitations.

Mr. MANN. But that is not the case here. There was no necessity for sending this case to the Court of Claims. The parties had the right to go in the courts, as proven by the fact that they did go into court.

Mr. GRAFF. I am not sure——

Mr. MANN. They did go into court to get relief.

Mr. GRAFF. The facts show that these people did give notice by filing the original petition——

Mr. MANN. And waited ten years without pressing it in any way whatever. If there was ever a case where a client or the party was guilty of gross laches it is this case. The gentleman has just stated the history of it. While I believe in standing by the gentleman and his committee, I do not believe he will say that people guilty of such gross negligence ought to receive any favor whatever.

Mr. GRAFF. I think the fact that they filed their claim in 1888 was notice to the Government that they proposed to hold the Government liable, by reason of the fact that the Government had withheld 20 per cent of the contract rate by reason of what was claimed to be a land-grant right when in fact it was not.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that the Government would not have a right to assume, after receiving that notice, and nothing was done under it for ten years, that the notice has been waived?

Mr. GRAFF. I suppose the Government would assume that if the parties did not file their proof; but I do not know but that it may be true that there was some proof taken under this petition that was filed in 1888.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, I know, is a good lawyer. Now, if he himself had filed a claim of this sort and proposed to let it pend ten years, would he have not filed a supplemental claim every year thereafter? And does he not think that this railroad company in the present case ought to sue its attorneys for their neglect, instead of coming here and begging from Congress relief to which they are not entitled?

Mr. GRAFF. The railroad company in this case is not asking anything except what is due them under the law.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken. Under the law they are entitled to nothing.

Mr. GRAFF. I mean under the law outside of the statute of limitations.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman means under a part of the law, after the rest is wiped out.

Mr. GRAFF. I do not think that the Government can afford to take the position that it proposes to insist upon keeping money which it has wrongfully withheld from a railroad company or anybody else. And I have no doubt that the officials in the Post-Office Department, who charged up this portion of this railroad right of way as land-grant road, did so under the supposition that it was land-grant road, and no doubt it was quite a surprise to them when the fact was developed that this portion of the road was wrongfully charged up against this company.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman, as I understand, does not claim that in this case the Government took any advantage of the railroad company. And is there anything in this case which would take it out of the line of every other case coming under the statute of limitations?

Mr. GRAFF. In this case, undoubtedly, money was paid by mistake—mistake on the part of the Government officers. I do not think that the Government moved these officials to make this claim wrongfully.

Mr. MANN. If the statute of limitations should be waived in this case, can the gentleman conceive any reason why it should be enforced in any other case?

Mr. GRAFF. I think there would be a peculiar hardship if we should place this railroad company on the same basis as we would a private individual and deny to this company reimbursement for this sum of money which was withheld from them for dates which intervened between the dates which were allowed by the court.

Mr. MANN. If this application is a meritorious one, why should we not repeal the statute of limitation? There was no surprise here; no advantage was taken; there was no excusable ignorance of the law.

Mr. GRAFF. The gentleman from Illinois knows that, as the law books tell us, the reason for a statute of limitations is upon the theory that after the expiration of the period provided by the statute the presumption of law should be that the claim has been paid. In other words, it would be a serious hardship after an interval of time, which we fix by statute, for people to be called into court and compelled to litigate.

Mr. MANN. That is not the theory of the statute of limitations as I learned it. The theory of that statute, according to what I learned, is that litigation after a certain period must cease.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. That controversies should be brought to trial while the parties are alive.

Mr. GRAFF. That is exactly what I said.

Mr. MANN. The theory of the law is that a man who sleeps upon his claim for a great number of years either acknowledges that he has no claim or is guilty of such laches that he is entitled to no consideration. That is exactly the case which the gentleman presents here.

Mr. GRAFF. As has been well suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH], one of the reasons why the statute of limitations is passed is because it is assumed that in the course of time parties or witnesses concerned in the controversy necessarily die; and hence it would operate as a peculiar hardship if parties were required to litigate a matter after the expiration of so long a period. Another of the moving causes for such a statute is that there must after a certain length of time be an end of litigation.

Now, in this case the parties are living. There is nothing about the proofs which makes it a hardship on either party that this relief should be granted. On the contrary, the essential facts stand out to-day conclusively established by the admission of the parties. There is nothing in this record to show that the delay in the trial of the petition which was filed in 1888 was not the fault of the Government. There is nothing to show but that the Government itself might have been the party in fault for the delay in the trial of the suit; and, indeed, I may say, as a matter of information from those who have had some experience in the Court of Claims that it is difficult to obtain a speedy trial in that court.

Mr. MADDOX. I will ask the gentleman if he called upon the Attorney-General, or, in other words, notified him of the pending of this claim.

Mr. GRAFF. No; I did not; but I addressed a letter to the Post-Office Department, to the head of the Department who had charge of these contracts and who is supposed to be the guardian of the interests of the Government in this case, and there was no objection on the part of the Post-Office Department to the passage of this legislation. The Department itself had no right to pay this claim until it was recognized by Congress, and this bill is simply a reference to the Treasury Department for the purpose of adjusting this account between the railroad company and the United States.

It is not the kind of a case where the lapse of time is to do any injury to either party; it is not the kind of a case where there is any conflict about the fact. There is not any difference at all between the case which was adjudicated and the one which we are considering. It is admitted right along to-day that the Government did withhold from this railroad company this 20 per cent excess over right of way, upon the theory that it was a land-grant right of way, when in fact it was not. The only trouble was the fact that it was not a land-grant road did not develop from a legal standpoint until the adjudication by the court.

Mr. PAYNE. Will the gentleman yield me five or ten minutes?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman, this bill goes a little further than my friend says. It not only opens these accounts and waives the statute of limitations, but it requires the officials to settle the claims in accordance with the decision—that is, at the same rate as the decision of the Court of Claims for the other years which were adjudicated. Now, what are the facts about this case, as stated by the gentleman? In 1888 this railroad company commenced an action in the Court of Claims against the Government, and in its petition claimed for only three years, although it had been carrying these mails for ten or twelve years under the same conditions—presumably under the same conditions. I do not know, it does not appear that the counsel for the railroad company knew that there was a statute of limitations. They may have thought it was only for three years instead of six. They may have thought that.

I notice, Mr. Chairman, generally in passing upon these claims, we do not waive the statute of limitations unless there is some excuse for the laches on the part of the claimant for not bringing his claim to the attention of the proper officials in the proper time, and also bringing it to the attention of the court within the proper time, within the six years. If he has a reasonable excuse——

Mr. SULZER. Let me suggest——

Mr. PAYNE. Just wait a moment and I will permit a question. If he has a reasonable excuse I know Congress generally or frequently, perhaps too frequently, waives the statute of limitations. Now, why is it that these eminent lawyers who brought this case into the Court of Claims did not claim for more than three years? It does not appear on the face of these papers. The chairman of the committee does not appear to be able to tell us. He says this was originally a land-grant road, but that the road was not completed in time, and that the Government forfeited the land grant.

Mr. GRAFF. That the railroad company forfeited it.

Mr. PAYNE. Well, the Government declared it forfeited.

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. As they did by act of Congress along in the eighties, in reference to several of these roads. I presume the difficulty with the gentleman who presented this petition was this, and this is what he had in mind, that this land grant was forfeited about the year 1882. As I remember, a number of land grants were forfeited then under the lead of Mr. Payson, of Illinois, who was then in the House. Up to that time it had been a land-grant road.

Mr. GRAFF. No. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PAYNE. I state the facts just as the gentleman did, that it was originally a land-grant road.

Mr. GRAFF. Will the gentleman allow me just a suggestion, and that is that Congress declared this land grant forfeited on July 4, 1870.

Mr. PAYNE. Then there is absolutely no excuse under heaven, Mr. Chairman, for these gentlemen not going back and claiming six years when they commenced this action in 1884, and it is their own laches and their own fault that they did not claim for that.

Mr. MANN. My colleague from Illinois [Mr. GRAFF] stated that the original action was commenced in 1888 and they did claim for six years.

Mr. PAYNE. No; only for three years.

Mr. MANN. You stated 1888.

Mr. PAYNE. Then he made a misstatement. Was it not in 1870 that the land grant was given to the railroad?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. Exactly, and it was afterwards forfeited.

Mr. GRAFF. A petition was filed in 1888, but the road was not to be built——

Mr. PAYNE. Well, Mr. Chairman, I say I was right in my original statement of facts in this case. Instead of being 1870 that the land grant was forfeited, it was in 1870 that the land grant was obtained, and they went on and built the road. But they did not build it in time, and in 1882, according to my recollection, Mr. Payson was performing on these land grants here in the House, and he had passed a good many bills, and I presume this was one of them, and that is the reason, because the land grant was not forfeited up to 1882, that these lawyers—and I presume they were profound lawyers—did not claim back of 1882.

Mr. GRAFF. The land grant was forfeited in 1870.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman said a moment ago that the land grant was made in 1870.

Mr. GRAFF. I did not.

Mr. PAYNE. I understood the gentleman to make that statement. But, Mr. Chairman, under the present statement there is no excuse for any claim. For six years they filed their petition, and there is no excuse for them not commencing away back of the year of 1870 to obtain this claim if they thought they had an honest claim. Nor do they give any reason for it. They allowed their rights to sleep for twenty years. Now the statute of limitation is not only passed for the living party. It was on account of the living witnesses and for the perpetuation of testimony that we have the statute of limitations. We can not allow them to come in and prove up a state of facts when the Government of the United States can not meet them.

Mr. SULZER. Is it not a fact that the statutes of limitation will not run against the Government?

Mr. PAYNE. Will my friend contain himself? They commenced this action in the Court of Claims in 1884, as I remember the statement of the gentleman, and then they have allowed it to sleep from then until 1898.

Mr. GRAFF. They commenced in 1888.

Mr. PAYNE. And from that time down to 1898, ten years, when they filed their supplemental petition. Why did they not file a supplemental petition every year, or every six years, and keep their claim alive? That has not been explained.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we can not go into a wholesale repeal of the statutes of limitation in favor of this Government. If we had repealed that law, it would vitalize claims amounting to millions and hundreds of millions of dollars that could easily be brought in the Court of Claims. If there is no more reasonable excuse for the laches of the parties than has been given in this case, I think the bill ought not to pass.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, no one has a greater respect for the present Committee on Claims than I have, or for the chairman of that committee. I believe that the House itself has a very great deal of confidence in the committee, which has been proven this afternoon by the number of claims which have been passed—certainly more than have been passed on any other day since I had the honor of a seat on this floor. But here is a case where a new precedent is proposed to be set. The distinguished gentleman who is the chairman of the Committee on Claims has stated that in almost every case which is reported from that committee and passed by the House the statutes of limitation are directly or indirectly waived.

I will call the attention of the gentleman to the great distinction between that class of cases and this. The ordinary case upon which this House passes is not a case which could be prosecuted either in the Court of Claims or any other court in the first instance at all. The claims are personal claims, which are equitable, and not a legal claim that could go to the Court of Claims, and by the time they have obtained authority to present those claims to the Court of Claims it becomes necessary to waive the statute of limitations in a number of cases. Here is a different proposition, where the parties had originally the right to enter the Court of Claims.

Now, what are the facts? This railroad company carried the mails in 1878. There was a dispute between the railroad company and the Government as to the rate of pay. For ten years this railroad company held this claim without going to the Court of Claims. They might have filed a claim at any time. But they waited ten years before commencing any proceedings in the Court of Claims. They first filed their claim in 1888, and waited ten years longer, not to try the case, but without taking any proceedings in the case at all. They waited twenty years, and then filed an amended petition in the Court of Claims.

If this bill passes waiving the statute of limitations, then, Mr. Chairman, the statute of limitations as applied to the Court of Claims ought to be repealed. There is no justice or reason in a case like this, and the statute of limitations ought not to be waived. Nothing is shown here as an equitable reason for paying the claim. No excuse is given here as a special reason for waiving the statute of limitations, but simply the fact that the parties did not prosecute their rights. That is the case always with the statute of limitations. But the time for obtaining evidence is passed. Who knows here whether these parties were entitled to the extra 20 per cent in 1878? There is absolutely no evidence of any evidence being secured. I hope the House will not set the precedent of waiving the statute of limitations on a purely legal claim where the parties could have protected their rights absolutely in the Court of Claims.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on laying the bill aside with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SULZER) there were 40 ayes and 23 noes.

So the bill was laid aside to be reported to the House with a favorable recommendation.

CHARLES T. CULVER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 678) for the relief of the heirs of the late Charles T. Culver.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I ask that that bill be passed without prejudice.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the bill will be passed without prejudice. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

CHARLES E. SAPP.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, there is a bill here which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. IRWIN] has asked me to ask unanimous consent to have taken up. It does not involve an appropriation, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be considered. It is a question of some lost stamps. It is H. R. 10775, for the relief of Charles E. Sapp.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Charles E. Sapp, late collector of internal revenue for the fifth district of Kentucky, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $300, to reimburse him for special-tax stamps for "worms manufactured," charged to him, which were never received by him.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the bill just reported be now considered.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I understood the gentleman from Illinois to say that this did not carry any appropriation.

Mr. GRAFF. Well, it is a formal matter. I am wrong about that, but there can be no objection to the bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Is it recommended by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue?

Mr. GRAFF. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I had risen for the purpose of objecting.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation?

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BARTLETT) there were 35 ayes and 4 noes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask the gentleman from Georgia to withdraw that point, and the gentleman from Illinois will ask unanimous consent to withdraw the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not want to make the point of no quorum, but I undertook to find out about the bill and was ruled out. Members must be decent about this.

Mr. IRWIN. I rose, Mr. Chairman, to explain about the bill, but did not succeed in getting the attention of the Chair. I would like to ask, Mr. Chairman, the privilege of stating the facts about the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Kentucky be permitted to address the committee on this bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have no objection to that.

Mr. IRWIN. The gentleman can raise the point of no quorum afterwards.

Mr. BARTLETT. I understood the gentleman from New York to say that if I would withdraw the point of no quorum the gentleman from Illinois would withdraw the bill. I am perfectly willing to do that. I have no objection to the gentleman from Kentucky being heard either.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the point and then the gentleman from Kentucky can explain his bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTLETT. Has unanimous consent been asked to withdraw it?

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked for its consideration.

Mr. BARTLETT. Unless I know some reason why the bill should be taken up out of order I shall object.

Mr. PAYNE. I suggest that the gentleman reserve his objection.

Mr. BARTLETT. I have no objection to reserving it.

Mr. IRWIN. Mr. Chairman, the only reason that I have asked that this bill be taken out of its order is this: There was a book of special-tax stamps for "worms manufactured," that was received by the collector of internal revenue and charged against him. The affidavits are filed with the report, showing that this book of stamps was destroyed, and he is still charged with them. The Treasury Department is now urging him to settle his account, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue says that the only way he can have relief is by a special act of Congress. I introduced this bill. I explained the circumstances of the case fully to the Speaker and to the chairman of the committee—that the settlement of this man's account is being held up on account of this matter of $200, the value of the book of stamps lost and never used.

By the passage of this bill no money at all goes out of the Treasury. It is simply a matter of bookkeeping—to relieve this man from the payment of $200 for stamps which were destroyed and lost. I asked the Speaker for the privilege of calling the bill up out of its order, and he said he thought it proper that the chairman of the committee should ask it, and he hoped he would do so. The consideration of this case will not take more than a moment. Here is the report, and here are the affidavits, which show that this book of stamps was lost. The passage of this bill is important in order that the ex-collector's accounts may be promptly settled.

Mr. BARTLETT. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue has recommended the passage of this bill?

Mr. IRWIN. Yes, sir. At least the letter of the commissioner is embraced in the report of the committee, and it suggests the introduction of a special act as the only means of relief. The report of the committee was unanimous in favor of the bill.

Mr. CANDLER. How was this book lost—in passing through the mails?

Mr. IRWIN. No; it was received, but was covered up in some waste paper and by mistake was taken down into the cellar at the custom-house and burned.

Mr. CANDLER. Then the collector received this book of stamps?

Mr. IRWIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CANDLER. And after he had received the stamps, they were burned by mistake?

Mr. IRWIN. Yes, sir—destroyed as shown by the affidavits.

Mr. CANDLER. And this man got no benefit from the stamps?

Mr. IRWIN. No benefit whatever.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

JOHN DONAHUE.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 10142) for the relief of John Donahue.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John Donahue, of Emmett, St. Clair County, Mich., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,074.14, due him in lieu of 40 acres of land patented to him by the United States and afterwards granted by the United States to the State of Michigan, causing a loss to the said John Donahue of the above-mentioned sum, and that interest at 6 per cent per annum be added from the date of the conveyance to the State of Michigan.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Claims was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the word "sum," in line 11, down to and including the word "Michigan," in line 13.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Chairman, this is a unanimous report, in which the facts are fully stated. John Donahue, the beneficiary in this bill, was the purchaser by homestead entry of a 40-acre piece of land in the county of St. Clair, Mich., for which he received a patent from the United States Government. Under that patent he took possession of the land and made improvements upon it. He spent a considerable number of years there improving and residing on the land. But later on the United States made a grant of swamp lands to the State of Michigan. The dates of these transactions are also set forth in the report. By some inadvertence on the part of the Government this little tract of land, which was the homestead of this man, which had been patented to him, was included within the description of a swamp-land grant to the State of Michigan. Later the grantee of the State began suit in ejectment against Donahue, and though Donahue prevailed in the circuit court, yet on appeal the supreme court of the State of Michigan, in a case which is reported in 31 Michigan Reports, held that the grant of the Government to the State in presenti gave a title, and the grantee of the Government was ousted in favor of the grantee of the State.

This man now asks Congress to restore to him the value of this land, which is shown by the report and proofs to be about $1,200. The committee, instead of allowing the value of the land, $1,200, proposes to allow him the lesser sum of $1,074.14, being the cost of the homestead and expenses in defending his title, etc.

Mr. PAYNE. Was not the value of the land considerably less than that?

Mr. WEEKS. The value of the land at the time this man received his patent was probably somewhat less than $1,074, but the value of the property at the time it was taken away from him was upward of $1,200. The committee thought that in fairness he ought to be paid back at least what the land had cost him. So the committee has unanimously reported in favor of $1,074.49.

Mr. PAYNE. I do not think we ought to pay this amount of money for that land. I suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that he insert an amendment fixing, say, $500. That would be four or five times what the man paid for the land.

Mr. WEEKS. The Government patented this land to this man, and some years afterwards, when it had advanced in value—after he had made his home there and spent his time and money upon it—the Government took it away from him by granting it to the State. Why should he now be asked to take $500 as its value? This is not a poor or an unjust Government——

Mr. PAYNE. Between individuals the measure of damages would be what he had paid for the land.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman from Michigan a question?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. What did this man pay for the land?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know. I know that what he paid altogether, including expenses, taxes, etc., amounted to $1,074.49. The Government, after patenting the land to this man, took it away from him by conveying it to the State of Michigan by an act of Congress.

Mr. GRAFF. After he had spent his time in improving it—after he had put work upon it?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes, sir—after he had cleared it up. The land as he received it was located in an almost impassable swamp. I have been through that country and know something about it.

Mr. MANN. How much were the taxes he paid?

Mr. WEEKS. The taxes which were paid amounted to——

Mr. MANN. To whom were they paid, the State of Michigan?

Mr. WEEKS. I suppose so. Land is taxed by the State and not by a general government.

Mr. MANN. If the State of Michigan has a law under which a man pays taxes, why should that man come to the United States Government to get those taxes back?

Mr. WEEKS. Because the United States gave him by patent that land, and afterwards caused the title, after he had improved the land, to pass away from under the man's feet, and impoverished him. It was the negligence of the Government in granting over again land that they had formerly conveyed to this man.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman understand that where the Government gives land it guarantees the title of a patent?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not so understand; but I understand that there is some—or should be—sense of honor to be observed on the part of the Government, as well as individuals, and if it makes such a mistake as that that it is in honor bound to make it good, and I am sorry to hear any gentleman invoking harsh technicalities in behalf of the Government against a poor man who has been defrauded by an act of the Government.

Mr. MANN. Did this man ever call on the Government to defend his title?

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, yes; when the case was in the courts in Michigan. I so understand it.

Mr. MANN. Whom did he notify to defend his title?

Mr. WEEKS. I do not know about that. He had lawyers who were representing him at the time, and I suppose the Government was notified if such notice was required by law to be given.

Mr. MANN. Now, I do not want to ask the gentleman embarrassing questions, but I understand that he says that he does not know what the man paid for the land; he does not know how much taxes he paid, and he does not know whom he notified to defend his title——

Mr. WEEKS. Oh, I do know this, that this great Government accepted the man's homestead entry, and he made his improvements, and he paid the Government the fees, and so forth, which were required by law; that he went on and completed his homestead entry and the Government gave him a patent, and relying on that he went to much expense in building and clearing and fencing, and did a great amount of labor on the land.

Mr. MANN. Does not the gentleman know that the Government of the United States does not guarantee a title when it issues a patent upon homesteads, and that it is a constant matter of litigation as to who the owner of those titles is.

Mr. WEEKS. I know that the Government of the United States does a great many things which it ought not to do toward creditors and claimants. I know that.

Mr. MANN. Well, the proposition to pay this bill is one of them.

Mr. WEEKS. Three years' experience on the Committee on Claims has demonstrated that fact to my satisfaction, and most thoroughly. This I consider as just a claim as——

Mr. MANN. Who did own this land at the time the patent was issued?

Mr. WEEKS. At the time the patent was issued to Donohue the title was in the United States.

Mr. MANN. And the United States granted a patent to it.

Mr. WEEKS. Yes; and afterwards it granted title to the State of Michigan, long after it had patented to John Donohue.

Mr. LACEY. Under what law in the State of Michigan?

Mr. WEEKS. Under a swamp-land grant of Congress, not under a law of the State of Michigan.

Mr. LACEY. The State got it under a swamp-land grant?

Mr. WEEKS. Some time about 1855, if I remember correctly.

Mr. LACEY. Then the State of Michigan really robbed this man of his land?

Mr. WEEKS. No; the Government deeded it to the State.

Mr. LACEY. Why did not the State of Michigan make it good to him?

Mr. WEEKS. The State of Michigan not knowing of the previous grant granted it to another person and that grantee ousted the grantee of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman say that after the patent had been issued the Government conveyed the land to the State of Michigan?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Is it not a fact that it gave the State of Michigan authority to select swamp lands which had not been conveyed by the Government, and that the State of Michigan located on this land, and the supreme court of Michigan, violating any idea of law, decided that the Michigander obtaining from the State of Michigan was more entitled than the other man, and you want the Government of the United States to make good to him.

Mr. WEEKS. If the gentleman will permit me, the case was tried by lawyers in Michigan, quite as able as is the gentleman from Illinois, and the supreme court of Michigan understood the law perhaps quite as well as the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. "The gentleman from Illinois" does not pretend to understand the law. Would the gentleman consent to an amendment providing that the State of Michigan shall pay this claim?

Mr. WEEKS. No; I would not. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the enacting clause.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, to strike out the enacting clause.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. WEEKS. I call for a division on that.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 34, noes 17.

So the enacting clause was stricken out.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration sundry bills and had directed him to report the same back to the House, some with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to, and some without amendments, with the recommendation that the bills as amended and those reported without amendments be passed. The committee had also directed him to report back to the House the bill H. R. 6652 and the bill H. R. 10142 with the enacting clause stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The first question is on the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole striking out the enacting clause in the bill H. R. 6652.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the amendment recommended by the Committee of the Whole to strike out the enacting clause of the bill H. R. 10142.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS WITHOUT AMENDMENT PASSED.

The following bills, reported back from the Committee of the Whole House without amendments, were severally ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

BRITISH SHIP FOSCOLIA.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 5124) for the relief of the owners of the British ship Foscolia and cargo.

Mr. GRAFF. Mr. Speaker, there is a Senate bill, and I ask unanimous consent to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to substitute the Senate bill for the House bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk reported the Senate bill 173, for the relief of the owners of the British ship Foscolia and cargo; which was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

House bill 5124 was ordered to lie on the table.

HOUSE BILLS WITH AMENDMENTS PASSED.

On the following House bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole with amendments, the amendments were severally considered and agreed to, the bills as amended were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

H. R. 989. A bill to authorize the Light-House Board to pay to Chamblin, Delaney & Scott the sum of $2,125 (title amended);

H. R. 807. A bill for the relief of F. R. Lauson (title amended).

RELIEF OF OFFICERS AND CREW OF U. S. S. CHARLESTON.

The next business reported from the Committee of the Whole was the bill (H. R. 5756) for the relief of the officers and crew of the United States steamer Charleston, lost in the Philippine Islands, November 2, 1899.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I offer an additional amendment to the bill, which is accepted by the chairman of the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2 strike out lines 10, 11, and 12, down to and including the word "incurred," and insert: "Value of such articles of personal property as were required by the United States naval regulations in force at the time of such loss."

The SPEAKER. The first question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is now on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GRAFF, a motion to reconsider the various votes by which the several bills were passed was laid on the table.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. FOSTER, for four days, on account of important business.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

Mr. DIETRICH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

NATIONAL SANITARIUM IN SOUTH DAKOTA.

Mr. GAMBLE submitted the following concurrent resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring). That the Committee on Enrolled Bills, in the enrollment of the bill (S. 593) for the establishment, control, operation, and maintenance of a national sanitarium of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Hot Springs, in the State of South Dakota, are hereby authorized to strike out the words "Branch Home" from line 12, page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the word "sanitarium."

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 593) for the establishment, control, operation, and maintenance of the Northern Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Hot Springs, in the State of South Dakota.

The amendments were, on page 1, line 4, to strike out all after "of" down to and including "Home," in line 5, and to insert "a national sanitarium."

On page 1, line 9, to strike out "Branch Home" and insert "sanitarium."

On page 2, line 2, to strike out "Home" and insert "sanitarium."

On page 2, line 7, to strike out "Home" and insert "sanitarium."

On page 2, line 12, to strike out "Home" and insert "sanitarium."

On page 2, line 13, to strike out "Home" and insert "sanitarium."

On page 2, line 14, to strike out "Home" and insert "sanitarium."

On page 2, line 17, to strike out "Home" and insert "sanitarium."

On page 2, line 20, to strike out "other."

And to amend the title so as to read: "An act for the establishment, control, operation, and maintenance of a national sanitarium of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Hot Springs, in the State of South Dakota."

Mr. GAMBLE. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

SPOKANE INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. QUARLES. I move to reconsider the votes by which the joint resolution (S. R. 101) fixing the time when a certain provision of the Indian appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1903, shall take effect was passed, the reason being that the Senate has passed a joint resolution which came from the House in almost the identical language, so that the Senate joint resolution is no longer necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to reconsider the votes by which the joint resolution indicated by him was reported to the Senate and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Shall the joint resolution be indefinitely postponed? The Chair hears no objection, and such will be the action of the Senate.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, I gave notice yesterday that I would ask for the consideration this morning, after the close of the routine business, of House bill 14018, known as the omnibus public-buildings bill. I understand from the Senator in charge of the Philippine government bill that he has arranged with some Senators to speak upon that measure during the morning hour. Therefore I shall not ask for the present consideration of the public-buildings bill this morning, but I shall take the first opportunity to bring it to the attention of the Senate; I hope possibly later to-day

Mr. HOAR. I will inquire of the Senator whether there is likely to be any debate or discussion on the public-buildings bill.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I should think not. It will take some time to read the bill, of course. That will consume the greater part of the time that will be occupied, I presume, in its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The morning business is closed.

INAUGURATION OF REPUBLIC OF CUBA.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Mr. President, I wish to say but a word. We have heard much criticism by the opposition of the course of the Administration with respect to the territory which came to the United States following the Spanish-American war. We have heard few words of commendation from the opposite side of the Chamber, though there has been and is much worthy of approval. We hear little else than charges of broken faith, though our faith is inviolate.

I do not rise to discuss the Philippine question, which is under debate, for I have spoken at length upon that subject and expressed to the Senate my views with respect to our course in the Philippine Islands. I rise now to direct attention to what transpired yesterday in the island of Cuba. In the history of this country and of civilized government there has never been an event of such splendid significance as that which was witnessed in that island yesterday. A solemn national pledge has been redeemed. A Republic has been erected under the authority of the United States, and the possession of the island has been surrendered to that Republic under happy auspices.

A great work has been accomplished in the cause of human liberty. Where there was monarchical power and tyranny four years ago a Republic has arisen and starts peacefully upon her career with the congratulations of the nations of the earth. The freedom of Cuba is accomplished—accomplished through the valor of American arms and the wisdom of American statesmanship. No suggestion of territorial aggrandizement swerved the nation from its self-imposed and arduous task.

I think it is proper that we should have printed in the RECORD the report of the important historic incident as it is found in the Associated Press dispatches of this morning. The report, which I hold in my hand, is a graphic but temperate one, and it will prove, I have no doubt, of interest to those who shall in the future study the history of the United States in its relation to the territory which came to its control at the conclusion of the Spanish-American war. I ask that the report may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. And as a document I hope it may be likewise printed. That is a very convenient form.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Indiana, that the report shall be printed in the RECORD, and also as a document? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HALE. Before the matter passes from the consideration of the Senate, I call attention to a resolution passed yesterday by the House of Representatives. It is found on page 5697 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. It is on the same subject the Senator from Indiana has so happily alluded to, and I now offer for consideration the same resolution that passed the House of Representatives yesterday striking out the words "this day," and appending a resolution directing the Secretary of State to transmit the same to the Cuban Government.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions submitted by the Senator from Maine will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Senate views with satisfaction and expresses congratulation at the appearance of the Cuban Republic among the nations of the world.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to transmit to the President of the Cuban Republic a copy of these resolutions.

Mr. HALE. I ask for the immediate consideration of the resolutions.

The resolutions were considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. HOAR. I suggest that the document just ordered printed, containing the matter laid before the Senate by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS], shall contain also the resolution passed yesterday by the House of Representatives and those just adopted by the Senate.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I think that is a very proper suggestion, and I accept it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolutions will be appended to the paper.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE REPUBLIC OF CUBA—ACCOUNT OF THE INAUGURATION OF ESTRADA PALMA AS PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF CUBA—THE DEPARTURE OF THE AMERICAN TROOPS, THE END OF AMERICAN RULE, AND THE HOISTING OF THE CUBAN FLAG IN THE ISLAND, AND ALSO RESOLUTIONS OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES IN RESPECT THERETO.

[By the Associated Press, Howard N. Thompson.]

HABANA, May 20, 1902.

The United States has redeemed her promise to the world. Habana and Santiago de Cuba to-day were evacuated by American troops, the reins of power were handed over to President Palma, and now the Government of Cuba is free, and to-night the whole island is delirious with joy.

Dramatic as was the remarkable demonstration when the flag of the United States was lowered and the flag of the new Republic hoisted in its place at noon to-day on the palace from whence Spain had ruled the island for centuries, it was hardly more stirring than the magnificent friendly demonstration which attended the departure of the cruiser Brooklyn as she sailed out of Habana Harbor a few minutes before 4 o'clock this afternoon.

A flotilla of harbor craft loaded to the guards with people and dressed with bunting from stem to stern escorted her to sea. The water front was a solid mass of people, and the old fortifications at La Punta, which, with Morro Castle opposite, guards the entrance to the narrow neck of the harbor, was a human hillock. The Brooklyn had waited until the Ward Line steamer Morro Castle and the tug Eagle sailed before weighing anchor. As became a commander, Gen. Leonard Wood desired to be the last to leave. The Brooklyn's anchorage was near the wreck of the battleship Maine, whose black shrunken skeleton was decorated to-day with American and Cuban flags by order of the city council.

When the beautiful cruiser steamed slowly by this pitiful memory the American ensign at her taffrail was dipped and the sailors generally doffed their caps. As she passed the grim walls of Cabanas and Morro Castle the Brooklyn moved swiftly, the American flag at her fore and the Cuban flag at her main peak, sailors manning her sides and the flag at her stern dipping continually to the storm of vivas from ashore and afloat. The Cuban colors on both the fortresses were lowered three times in salute, although it is not military etiquette for a fort to salute except with guns. But an army four hours old is not expected to know this. General Wood stood on the bridge of the cruiser and acknowledged the ovation he received by bowing and touching his cap.

The flotilla of small craft kept on in the wake of the Brooklyn until she was hull down on the horizon, then the boats turned back and the people at the entrance of the harbor returned to their jubilations.

The enthusiasm in the city was boundless. Many persons were literally mad with joy over their new-born liberty. The streets were full of surging, cheering men and women. Motley processions paraded the plazas.

Firecrackers, of the giant variety, were exploded on the sidewalks and even in the cafés. It was like a combination of an old-fashioned American Fourth of July and a national convention.

One hundred thousand visitors were said to be in the city, and the police were utterly unable to cope with the joy-intoxicated people.

But President Palma and his cabinet did not give way to rejoicing. There was stern business ahead for them, and they went early to work. As soon as the new Government was installed Congress met and proclaimed the constitution and appendix. President Palma reviewed 14,000 school children before the palace, and at 4 o'clock he went to the cathedral where a Te Deum was sung for the new Republic. It was an imposing ceremony. President Palma then devoted an hour before dinner to attending to some urgent matters, among which was the postal relations with the United States.

By his direction Washington was informed that Cuba would like to continue the present arrangement temporarily.

This evening the city is illuminated as never before, and a great pyrotechnic display is being given on the walls of Morro Castle and Cabanas across the bay.

The natal day of the new Republic found Habana arrayed like a queen to await the coming of her lord. She seemed reinvested for the occasion with the dignity of the prosperous days of her power and wealth. The decorations were universal. In some cases men had worked all night, by the light of torches, to complete elaborate designs. There was not a residence, pretentious or humble, that did not bear upon its quaint façade some emblem in honor of the event. The many arches erected at the entrances of plazas by political societies, fraternal clubs, residences of various civil divisions of the city, and business organizations had an air of real grandeur.

The scaffolding was covered with canvas painted in imitation of marble, and from a distance the illusion was complete. Bunting, spread on Venetian masts, canopied the deep, narrow streets from the rays of the sun. Beneath these canopies the Cuban colors and palms graced the open doorways, through which glimpses could be caught of luxuriant gardens, in cool, inner courts. Many of the balconies jutting from the white-walled buildings were adorned with roses. Nature seemed in harmony with the spirit of the festivities. The parks were literally aflame with tropical flowers, and the vaulted sky above might have been chiseled out of turquoise. Above every red-tiled roof rose a Cuban flag. The whole city seemed suddenly buried beneath a forest of waving banners.

The decorations along the water front were exceedingly lavish, and all the shipping in the harbor was dressed in gala attire. The majority of the ships flew the American ensign at the main and the Cuban colors at the fore or mizzen. The United States armored cruiser Brooklyn which was to take General Wood away, and the steamer Morro Castle, of the Ward Line, on which the troops were to embark, as well as the foreign war ships which had been sent by their governments to be present at the birth of the new Republic, were dressed with streams of signal flags fore and aft, man-of-war fashion. The American colors, which were to be hauled down in a few hours, still floated above the grim walls of the fortresses which guard the entrance of the harbor. Not another bit of color showed upon them.

The early morning was cool and delightful, and the entire population, reenforced by thousands of visitors, was abroad soon after daylight. All was animation and expectancy. The streets were swarming with people and were filled with a ceaseless din. The babble of voices was drowned by the sharp cries of drivers and the clamor of warning bells. As the coachmen drove their carriages madly over the stony pavements pedestrians had a busy time keeping out of the way of the wheels. There are 4,000 public carriages in Habana, and this morning each one of them seemed racing somewhere on a life or death mission.

Much curiosity was aroused by a statue of freedom which had been raised during the night in Central Park upon the pedestal where for centuries a statue of Queen Isabella had stood. During the morning a bountiful breakfast was given to several thousand poor children by Mr. Payne, of Boston, who has passed the winter in Habana for many years.

As the day advanced the heat of the sun became intense and the weather grew hotter every minute. Hot air from the hot streets quivered in the hot sky until the whole landscape wavered.

The actual transfer of the control of the island was scheduled to occur exactly at noon, Habana time, which is 12.30 p. m. Washington time, but those invited to witness the ceremony were requested to be at the palace at 11.30 a. m. They included, besides the American officers and the members of President-elect Palma's cabinet, the members of Congress, the supreme court judges, the governors of the provinces, the officers of the visiting war ships, the foreign consuls, William Jennings Bryan, the other visiting American statesmen, several of Señor Palma's Central Valley (N. Y.) neighbors, Horatio Rubens, counsel for the former Cuban junta; Col. William Astor Chanler, and a few other specially invited guests.

The palace is an imposing yellow stone structure, the upper stories of its front being built over a stone colonnade, giving it a fine architectural effect. For centuries it was the residence of the captains-general of Spain. Since the American occupation it has been the official headquarters of the military governor. It fronts an exquisite park, the Place de Armas, with its stately royal palms and species of banyan trees called "laurels of India." In the center is a fine marble statue of Ferdinand VII. Through the center of the building an archway leads, as in all Spanish palaces, to the patio, or court, where a statue of Columbus rises from a mass of palms and flowering plants.

On either side of the entrance marble stairways ascend to the audience room, which opens through balconied windows upon the plaza. In this chamber the actual transfer occurred. It is an imposing room, oblong, with a lofty ceiling and marble floor. It formed a fine setting for the historic occasion. The chamber to-day is exactly as it was when the Spaniards departed, except that the portraits of the captains-general which hung upon its walls are gone. They were taken back to Spain, but coats-of-arms of Spain, with their royal quarterings, still hang above the windows, which are screened by the same scarlet curtains that were hanging during the Spanish régime. The decorations, white and gold, with the superb mirrors, have also been preserved just as they were left by the Spaniards. The chair, with a gold crown above its back, which was reserved for the Spanish monarch himself, was visible in an adjoining apartment.

Owing to the limited space, the people were to have no sight of the ceremony to be enacted here, which was to constitute them a nation before the world, but outside they were to witness a spectacle which would stir their pulses, for they were to see the beloved five-barred and single-starred flag which Cespedes first threw to the breeze in 1868, at the opening of the ten years' war, raised by the act of the United States above the palace. This thing which was to happen had been the dream of their lives and their ancestors' for generations. Their parents, brothers, and friends had gone to their deaths to accomplish it. No strange wonder, then, that hours before the time set they began flocking here from all quarters of the city. Many were already before the palace with the rising sun, and some even slept in the park, to be certain not to miss the sight.

A portion of the plaza was kept clear by the police very early. The remainder was packed with people so thick that the ground seemed alive.

Soon all the side streets running into the plaza were choked into a solid mass of humanity and every door and window fronting the square was walled in with faces, white and black, old and young, male and female. Then crowds sought the roofs, overflowing every building that commanded a view of the flagstaff on the palace. As far as the eye could see the roof of the lines were fringed with human freight. It was a sight to live forever in memory.

The first demonstration occurred at about 11 o'clock, when eight dismounted troops of the Seventh Cavalry, under the command of Colonel Baldwin, marched into the plaza, preceded by the regimental band. The cavalrymen were arrayed in khaki uniforms and carried carbines. They formed in three sides of an oblong square, facing the palace, their center resting on the statue of King Ferdinand. The greeting the American soldiers received was cordial, but real enthusiasm was first manifested upon the appearance of two batteries of native artillery, who, coming up at double-quick time, wheeled into line and grounded arms in the street directly below the balconies of the palace. The maneuver was executed smartly and the crowd cheered with pride.

Shortly after the guests began to arrive, and a state occasion of a first-class European power could not have commanded more ceremony. Officers of the Army and the Navy of the United States, officers of Italian and English war ships in the harbor, as well as foreign consuls, were arrayed in all the splendor of their full uniforms. The British consul-general, Lionel Edward Gresley Carden, who has been appointed minister to Cuba, wore the embroidered diplomatic uniform of his new rank. The Chinese consuls came in flowing silks, the judges in their ermine, and the archbishop of Habana in the purple robes of his high ecclesiastical office. Gen. Maximo Gomez, the idol of the Cuban people, with his hawk-like head and shoulders erect in spite of his seventy-eight years, came attended by some of his old companions in arms. The President-elect, attired simply in a black suit with frock coat, with Jeffersonian simplicity walked over from the Senate chamber at the head of the members of Congress. There was an air of distinction in Señor Palma's carriage notwithstanding his slight figure.

General Wood entered the chamber after all were assembled. Greetings were exchanged informally, and the best of good feeling was displayed. For twenty minutes the gathering waited, during which time photographers made several flash-light pictures and the click of camera shutters sounded like the popping of small arms.

The transfer occurred exactly at noon. The ceremony was brief and simple. General Wood and Señor Palma faced each other. General Gomez stood immediately behind his future President in an open space around which clustered the other witnesses of the birth of the Republic. Mr. Bryan was in the front row of spectators. In a low but clear voice General Wood read his letter from the President and proclamations turning over the island to the Cuban Government, as follows:

WHITE HOUSE, Washington, D. C., May 10, 1902.

To the President and Congress of the Republic of Cuba.

SIRS: On the 20th of this month the military governor of Cuba will, by my direction, transfer to you the control and government of the island of Cuba, to be thenceforth exercised under the provisions of the constitution adopted by your constitutional convention as on that day promulgated; and he will thereupon declare the occupation of Cuba by the United States to be at an end.

At the same time I desire to express to you the sincere friendship and good wishes of the United States, and our most earnest hopes for the stability and success of your Government, for the blessings of peace, justice, prosperity, and ordered freedom among your people, and for enduring friendship between the Republic of the United States and the Republic of Cuba.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States.

Proclamation "B" was issued by General Wood as military governor. It recites in due form that the Cuban Congress convened in Habana May 5, examined the credentials, and certified to the election of the senators and representatives now in the Congress, and also found Thomas Estrada Palma and Cuba Luis Esteves Romero to have been elected, respectively, President and Vice-President of the Republic; that on May 20, at noon, the Cuban constitution will go into effect. Therefore the document reads:

"Thereupon and at that time the occupation of Cuba by the United States and the military government of the island will cease and determine, and the government and control of the island will be transferred to the President and Congress so elected, to be held and exercised by them under the constitution so promulgated.

"Such transfer will be upon the understanding and condition that the new Government does thereby and by the acceptance thereof, pursuant to the provisions of the said appendix to the constitution, assume and undertake all and several the obligations assumed by the United States with respect to Cuba by the treaty between the United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen Regent of Spain signed at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898."

Proclamation "C" simply declares the new constitution to be in full force after the date thereof, and recites its provisions.

Then comes the following:

"D."

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF CUBA,
Habana, May 20, 1902.

To the President and Congress of the Republic of Cuba:

SIRS: Under the direction of the President of the United States, I now transfer to you as the duly elected representatives of the people of Cuba the government and control of the island, to be held and exercised by you under the provisions of the constitution of the Republic of Cuba heretofore adopted by the constitutional convention and this day promulgated; and I hereby declare the occupation of Cuba by the United States and the military government of the island to be ended.

The transfer of government and control is upon the express condition, and the Government of the United States will understand that by the acceptance thereof you do now, pursuant to the provisions of the said constitution, assume and undertake, all and several, the obligations assumed by the United States with respect to Cuba by the treaty between the United States of America and Her Majesty the Queen Regent of Spain, signed at Paris on the 10th day of December, 1898.

All money obligations of the military government down to this date have been paid as far as practicable. The public civil funds derived from the revenues of Cuba transferred to you this day, amounting to $689,191.02, are transferred subject to such claims and obligations properly payable out of the revenues of the island as may remain. The sum of $100,000 has been reserved from the transfer funds to defray anticipated expenses of accounting, reporting, and winding up the affairs of the military government, after which any unexpended balance of said sum will be paid into the treasury of the island.

The plans already devised for the sanitation of the cities of the island and to prevent a recurrence of epidemic and infectious diseases, to which the Government of the United States understands that the provision of the constitution contained in the fifth article of the appendix applies, are as follows:

(1) A plan for the paving and sewering of the city of Habana, for which a contract has been awarded by the municipal of that city to McGivney, Rokeby & Co.

(2) A plan for waterworks to supply the city of Santiago de Cuba, prepared by Capt. S. E. Rockenbach, in charge of the district of Santiago, and approved by the military governor, providing for taking water from the wells of San Juan canyon, and pumping the same to reservoirs located on the heights to the east of the city.

(3) A plan for the sewering of the city of Santiago de Cuba, a contract for which was awarded to Michael J. Dady & Co., by the military governor of Cuba, and now under construction.

(4) The rules and regulations established by the President of the United States on the 17th of January, 1899, for the maintenance of quarantine against epidemic diseases at the ports of Habana, Matanzas, Cienfuegos, and Santiago de Cuba, and thereafter at the other ports of the island, as extended and amended and made applicable to future conditions, by the order of the military governor, dated ——, published in the Official Gazette of Habana on the —— day of April, 1902.

(5) The sanitary rules and regulations in force in the city of Habana (and in any other city having official rules, etc.).

It is understood by the United States that the present government of the Isle of Pines will continue as a de facto government, pending the settlement of the title to said island by treaty pursuant to the Cuban constitution and the act of Congress of the United States approved March 2, 1901.

I am further charged by the President of the United States to deliver to you the letter which I now hand you.

LEONARD WOOD,
Military Governor.

General Wood then handed Señor Palma President Roosevelt's letter. President Palma, who hardly reached to General Wood's shoulder, had listened patiently to the reading and he immediately replied in Spanish, reading, as General Wood had done, the formal acceptance of the conditions imposed.

The President's voice rose until it rang through the chamber as he declared his Government accepted the responsibilities of sovereignty. He spoke as follows:

"I receive in this act the Government of the island of Cuba, which you transfer to me in compliance with the orders communicated to you by the President of the United States, and I recognize that in this act the military occupation of the island ceases. In accepting this transfer I declare that the Government of the Republic of Cuba assumes, in conformity with what is determined in the constitution, each and all of the obligations that the Government of the United States took upon itself in regard to Cuba by virtue of the treaty signed on the 10th day of December, 1898, between the United States and Her Majesty the Queen Regent of Spain.

"I note that all financial responsibilities contracted by the military government up to this date have been paid; that $100,000 has been set aside to attend, in so far as is necessary, to the liquidation and settlement of the obligations contracted by said government, and that there have been transferred to the Government of the Republic $689,191.02, which constitutes the balance in cash to the credit of the nation.

"In all that Article V of the constitutional appendix be applicable the Government will take care to facilitate the execution of the work of sanitation planned by the military government. The Cuban Government will also endeavor, as far as possible and as far as depends on it, to comply with the necessity of sanitation and of the observance of the system established by the military government of Cuba.

"It is understood that the Isle of Pines continues de facto under the jurisdiction of the Government of the Republic pending what will be agreed upon between the United States and Cuba and in conformity with what is ordered in the Cuban constitution and by the law voted by the Congress of the United States passed March 2, 1901.

"I receive with great satisfaction the letter which President Roosevelt has addressed to the Congress of the Republic and to me on account of the sentiments of friendship therein expressed for the people of Cuba.

"I take advantage of this solemn occasion when there is fulfilled the honest promise of the Government and of the people of the United States in regard to the island of Cuba, and when the personality of our country is established as a sovereign nation, to express to you as a worthy representative of that great nation the immense gratitude that the people of Cuba feel for the American nation, for its illustrious President, Theodore Roosevelt, and to you personally, for the efforts which you have made for the attainment of that cherished ideal."

The formal transfer was now over, but President Palma added a few words in English expressive of his deep sense of gratitude to the American Government and of his personal thanks to General Wood, to which the latter responded in a most cordial spirit. Then came the congratulations. Everybody crowded about the new President to shake his hand and wish him success. General Gomez embraced him according to the Spanish custom. There were tears in the eyes of many persons present, and many of the Cubans hugged each other for very joy.

In the meantime there transpired a scene outside the palace to stir the pulses and live forever in the memory of those who witnessed it. For one hour before noon a hundred thousand people had stood with eyes glued on the American flag floating over the palace.

As the time approached for the flag to be lowered, several premature demonstrations occurred. Bells rang, steam sirens in the harbor shrieked, and rockets and aerial bombs were exploded. But these were mere whispers compared with the volume of sound which burst forth when the American flag came down at 10 minutes past 12. Lieutenant McCoy, of General Wood's staff, was on the roof of the palace, and two troopers of the Seventh Cavalry were in charge of the halyards which hung down to the balcony in front of the palace, it having been General Wood's original intention personally to hoist the Cuban flag in the name of the United States. When the signal was given that the ceremony inside was over, the halyards were loosed and the American colors floated slowly down. The American cavalry below saluted, and the cavalry band played The Star Spangled Banner. A roar which rolled over the entire city went up from the populace, and like an echo came the distant boom of one of the great guns at the Cabanas fortress across the bay, the first of 45 such detonations, one for every State in the Union.

The American flag had been lowered at Cabanas and from Morro and the other forts around the city simultaneously with the one over the palace. Then all the bells in the city added to the din. Giant firecrackers were exploded until a pall of smoke arose over the city. All this was kept up for five minutes, until the Cuban flag was hoisted. As it blew free over the palace and rose on the forts to the view of the assembled thousands, the roar was redoubled again. The guns of Cabanas spoke this time with the national salute of 21 guns. The United States cruiser Brooklyn and the English and Italian warships in the harbor set the flag of the new Republic at the main and also saluted it with 21 guns. The Cuban bands stationed on the plaza at Malacon, Morro, and in other places in the city, blared forth in pride of their country, while the guns of the ships thundered the strength of war.

But it was the demonstration of the people that overshadowed all the rest. Their vivas were like the roar of the ocean. They rose and fell. Women waved handkerchiefs, fans, and parasols. Men jumped up and down for joy, and everybody embraced his neighbor. Tears flowed from many eyes, but the shouting did not cease. The crowds shouted vivas for the United States, for President Palma, for General Gomez, and for General Wood, and it was ten minutes before the storm of sound began to subside, and there was another wild roar as General Wood and the American officers left the palace for the pier.

In the meantime the troops of cavalry in the plaza had quietly marched to the wharf and embarked on the Ward Line steamer Morro Castle. General Wood and his aids were escorted to the pier by President Palma, the entire cabinet, the Cuban Congress, and the consular corps. They also were accompanied by the best Cuban band in Habana. The demonstration they received all along the route was remarkable, and left no doubt of the gratitude and the good will of the Cubans toward the Americans. General Wood and the other officers then entered the steam launch and were taken across the shining waters of the bay to the Brooklyn.

As General Wood climbed up the side of the cruiser and set foot on her deck the marine guard on board was paraded and the former governor-general of the island was given a salute of 21 guns.

During the early morning many troops of school children marched into the plaza de Armas, ranged themselves before the palace, and sang an American anthem.

At 10 o'clock a delegation from the Central Veterans' Club presented General Wood with a handsome machete having a beautifully engraved hilt. It has the Cuban coat of arms and a single gold star on one side and the General's initials on the other in gold.

President Loubet, of France, has sent the following cablegram to President Palma:

"At the moment when your excellency takes official possession of your high duties I send my sincere congratulations, and I pray for your personal happiness and the prosperity of Cuba."

President Palma has received other congratulations from the presidents of Guatemala and Santo Domingo and from the Mexican House of Representatives. He also received several congratulatory messages from Spain and hundreds from the United States.

OFFICIAL ACTION IN WASHINGTON.

[By the Associated Press.]

WASHINGTON, May 20.

Secretary Hay, according to the plan arranged some time ago, took the final step to-day of acquainting the nations of the globe that the United States Government has redeemed its solemn pledge to make a free people in the island of Cuba. This was done by the dispatch by cable to every capital where there is resident either an ambassador or minister for the United States of the following identic note:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Washington, May 20, 1902.

SIR: I am directed by the President to inform you that the military occupation of the island of Cuba by the United States has this day ceased, and that an independent government, republican in form, has been inaugurated there, under the Presidency of His Excellency Señor Don Tomas Estrada Palma.

You are instructed to convey this information through the appropriate channel to the government to which you are accredited.

I am, sir, your obedient servant, JOHN HAY.

In issuing this notice Secretary Hay also takes upon himself the burden of looking after Cuban affairs, so far as they are yet placed under the observation of the United States by the terms of the Platt amendment wrought into the Cuban constitution. Secretary Root lays down his work, having no further official interest in the island save in the maintenance of the small force of United States soldiers who are taking care of the defenses of Habana until the Cubans are themselves trained to this work. President Roosevelt this afternoon received the following cablegram from the President of the new Republic:

HABANA, May 20, 1902.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT, President, Washington:

The Government of the island having been just transferred, I, as Chief Magistrate of the Republic, faithfully interpreting the sentiments of the whole people of Cuba, have the honor to send you and the American people testimony of our profound gratitude, and the assurance of an enduring friendship, with wishes and prayers to the Almighty for the welfare and prosperity of the United States.

T. ESTRADA PALMA.

President Roosevelt also has received the following cablegram from President Loubet, of France, dated at Kronstad to-day:

"At the time when the Cuban Republic is proclaimed under the mighty ægis of the United States of America, I make it my duty to offer to Your Excellency my very sincere felicitations and to send you the wishes that I form for the prosperity of the young Republic.

"EMIL LOUBET."

The following dispatch was received at the White House to-night from General Wood at Habana:

To the President of the United States, Washington:

I have the honor to report to you that in compliance with instructions received I have this day at 12 o'clock, sharp, transferred to the President and Congress of the Republic of Cuba the government and control of the island, to be held and exercised by them under the provisions of the constitution of the Republic of Cuba. Documents sent to me were read, and Mr. Palma, in accepting the responsibilities on behalf of the island, expressed himself in kind and endearing words and thanks, and thanked the Republic of the United States and its officials for all that has been done for Cuba and for the fulfillment of promises made. The ceremony was most impressive, and I embark on the Brooklyn, with my staff, for the United States.

WOOD.

Secretary Root sent the following congratulatory telegram to President Estrada Palma:

"President of the Republic of Cuba:

"Believe in my heartfelt congratulations upon the inauguration of the Republic which the people of Cuba and the people of the United States have fought and labored together to establish. With confidence in your unselfish patriotism and courage and in the substantial civic virtues of your people, I bid you godspeed, and on this happy day wish for Cuba for all time liberty and order, peace and prosperity."

To continue the present postal relations between Cuba and this country President Palma, of Cuba, and President Roosevelt to-day issued proclamations, both of which were promulgated from this city in accordance with an understanding reached between them some weeks ago. President Roosevelt's formal order follows:

"Ordered, The postal administration of the United States having concurred therein, that pending the conclusion of a postal convention between the Republic of Cuba and the United States the status prescribed by Order No. 395 of the Postmaster-General of the United States, dated March 30, 1901, relative to the exchange of mails between Cuba and the United States, be maintained: that is to say, articles mailed in Cuba addressed for delivery in the United States, and articles mailed in the United States addressed for delivery in Cuba, shall continue to be subject to the postage rates, conditions, and classification applicable to articles circulating in the domestic mails of the United States.

"And it is further ordered that the arrangement now in force regarding the exchange of money orders between the United States and Cuba shall continue and be in effect until a formal convention shall be signed between the two countries covering further exchange of money orders between the two countries."

President Palma's order is identical with the above except that it reverses the order in which the two countries are named.

INAUGURATION OF CUBAN REPUBLIC.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I ask the unanimous consent of the House for the consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Resolved, etc., That this House views with satisfaction, and expresses congratulation at, the appearance this day of the Cuban Republic among the nations of the world."

[Loud applause.]

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of this resolution? [A pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, it is evidently unnecessary that there should be any debate on this resolution. I will merely say that it was suggested by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SULZER] [applause]; and I know that all members on both sides of the House will welcome the opportunity to vote for it.

The question being taken, the resolution was adopted.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE SENATE MAY 21, 1902.

Resolved by the Senate of the United States of America, That the Senate views with satisfaction, and expresses congratulation at, the appearance of the Cuban Republic among the nations of the world.

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be directed to transmit to the President of the Cuban Republic a copy of these resolutions.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13395) "making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 13, 21, 40, 55, 65.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 30, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 51, 52, 53, 54, 57, 61, 63, 64, 67, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert $110,000; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$612,730;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$254,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$291,860;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: On page 40 of the bill, in line 16, after the word "report" insert the words ", giving his reasons;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$10,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$8,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 59, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$18,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$796,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 62, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$796,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 66, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$65,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

REDFIELD PROCTOR,
H. C. HANSBROUGH,
WM. B. BATE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

J. W. WADSWORTH,
E. S. HENRY,
H. D. ALLEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate agree to the report of the conference committee?

Mr. HALE. I wish to ask the Senator in charge of the bill, who has made the report, whether there has been put in by the conferees any new matter whatever not considered by either House?

Mr. PROCTOR. Not anything at all. There were three words inserted in an amendment which we proposed.

Mr. HALE. That is the amendment "giving his reasons?"

Mr. PROCTOR. "Giving his reasons." I believe those are the only additional words which have been put in.

Mr. HALE. They do not touch the merit of the appropriation.

Now, one thing further. So far as I could gather from listening to the reading of the report, the amendments are where the amounts have been fixed by the conferees. Is there any case here where the conferees have put in amounts larger than the amount fixed by one or the other House of Congress?

Mr. PROCTOR. There is not. In every case where they have agreed to one of our amendments with an amendment it has been to reduce in part the addition that we made.

Mr. HALE. Thus being a compromise between the amounts given in the bill as it came from the House and the amounts given in the Senate amendments?

Mr. PROCTOR. In every case.

Mr. HALE. And in no case has the conference exceeded the amounts of appropriation fixed either by one House or the other?

Mr. PROCTOR. In no case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The report was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 16th instant approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 74) relating to publications of the Geological Survey.

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on the 19th instant approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. 82) providing for the printing annually of franks required for sending out seed.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. ALLISON. In the temporary absence of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who has charge of the Philippine government bill, I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. WELLINGTON. Mr. President, I rise to speak upon the bill now under consideration without the hope of in any way affecting the foregone conclusion as to the action of this body upon the measure. I know that the fiat of the Administration has gone forth that the bill must pass, and the minority in the Senate can not by any effort honorably made prevent the consummation of an act which is but a part of one of the most extraordinary and indefensible policies ever pursued by any nation of whom history hath made record.

Three months ago, after prolonged debate, in which the minority party made a gallant struggle for the preservation of the principle upon which this nation is founded, the Senate passed a bill temporarily to provide revenue for the Philippine Islands. It was the beginning of attempted civil legislation for the Philippine Archipelago, and was in contravention of the organic law of our nation, the spirit of our institutions, and the generous, liberal, and statesmanlike policies which have obtained in our Republic for a century and a decade of years. By the passage of that act the Congress of the United States for the first time made a partial attempt to govern the islands by civil law, and, in my humble judgment, disregarded every principle of law which should have bound the American Congress.

It is but a natural and logical sequence that within a few weeks thereafter there should be introduced into the Senate another bill which should carry the policy, thus begun, further on its way and to add another exemplification of the historic fact that a nation which commits a wrong in its transaction with another people will endeavor to perpetuate, confirm, and firmly establish it by doing additional wrongs.

When the revenue bill was passed the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], whose task it was to present and defend the measure, contended that there should be no settled policy announced, and that as the exigencies of environment and the necessities of occasion required we should, month after month and year after year, content ourselves in temporizing with the situation.

These bills pretend that they are temporary measures, but, sir, they have committed this Government beyond a peradventure, and unless there is an awakening of the conscience of the nation there will be fastened and irrevocably placed upon us the policy of colonial expansion, of imperial armies, of unjust, horrible, and criminal wars, and above all a surrender of the most precious heritage that the American people have possessed—that of being a free people, standing first and almost alone for self-government, not only for themselves but for every nationality in every clime.

The Senator spoke truly when he said there would probably be transformations in the situation and many changes in our mode of dealing with the Filipinos who had come into our hands as it were through the providence of God. Three months have wrought a most remarkable change. Three months ago, when the policy of conducting an unauthorized and therefore unconstitutional war for the subjugation of these people was debated, when charges were made and conclusive proof was offered that our Army had in the progress of this war, which was to be conducted to the bitter end and not to be given up until there be abject and complete submission or extermination of the people, been guilty of criminal warfare, the majority party flung back with scorn the accusation, contending that it was little short of treason for any Senator to have the temerity of accusing the Army of indulging in modes of war which Christian civilization should forever prohibit to a nation professing its tenets.

We were taught to believe that the American soldier and the officer commanding him were immaculate, that they could do no wrong, and that the attacks made upon the Army were not only unjust, but of such a character as should be reprobated by every fair-minded American. The trend of every speech delivered upon the floor of the Senate favoring the passage of the Philippine revenue bill was in this direction. The idea that the conduct of our Army was reprehensible was scouted, and the Senators who made it were violently attacked for encouraging insurrection and accused of infidelity to the American Government and of disloyalty to the State.

When it was charged by the minority that in the conduct of the war the American Army had been guilty—descending in its commission of crime step by step until it had reached a degradation almost beyond belief, the majority rose up and smote us by declaring that the men who would thus attack soldiers of the Union, fighting under the flag for their country in a far-off land, should be buried in obloquy and stand in the pillory of public scorn. Yet, sir, within this short time which has elapsed since the passage of that bill the majority has been forced to abandon this position and to acknowledge that the American Army has committed indefensible crimes against a people who have the same right to liberty that we ourselves have.

They have been forced to acknowledge that the American Army has step by step departed from the broad highway of honorable warfare—honorable modern warfare as recognized by civilized nations—and has adopted methods of barbarism and savagery such as the wild natives of the unconquered Philippine Islands themselves could not approach. For, sir, as the damnable evidence of these transactions forced themselves into publicity, against the desire and effort of the Administration, there arose before the American people a picture of warfare such as could not be outdone if his Satanic majesty were to lead the hordes of hell upon an orgy of blood and rapine.

John Milton many years ago, when he was blind, sitting in the darkness which covered him and surrounded him, wrote in his imagination the picture of Lucifer, the fallen angel, leading the hordes of hell against God. He there gave the description that strikes with horror the reader when he peruses the book. It would need another Milton to describe the fall of the American people from the original height of their Government and their descent into the hell of this war.

Now, sir, the majority can no longer deny these facts, and they have therefore been forced to change their programme, and under such circumstances it is indeed a most advantageous thing to commit yourself to any policy or profess any stated belief.

What is the present policy? It is one of admission of the crimes and cruelties and defense for the crime. When this debate began it was the obvious determination of the majority party to shorten debate by making no reply to the charges, the reproaches, and the recommendations of the minority. But, sir, they were forced to change front once more. Silence would not do. The Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and others had drawn such an indictment as must be answered, if answer there could be made, because upon this indictment the Administration will be tried in the next Presidential election.

Gradually there was an awakening, and one by one Senators were prevailed upon to enter the debate. But, sir, in all the debate from this side of the Chamber there was not one Senator who addressed himself directly to the subject-matter under consideration, saving the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who was in charge of the bill, and therefore it became his duty to make explanation of the measure. I might perhaps except the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD], who argued upon the commercial advantages that would come through the permanent occupation of the Philippine Archipelago, but even he departed from the path which he should have trodden and introduced sectional politics and the race war in the South. It does not belong here. It is outside of this question. The people of the South and the people of this country can solve that problem in the future. We are now dealing with the Philippine question.

Mr. DUBOIS. Would it interrupt the Senator if I should say a word?

Mr. WELLINGTON. Not at all.

Mr. DUBOIS. I should like to remind the Senator that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD] also is the only one on the majority side of the Chamber who has stated plainly what the policy of the Republican party is to be. He said that, so far as he was concerned, they intended to hold those islands for all time to come.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I thank the Senator for the interjection. I desire to say that as my argument goes on I think I can demonstrate that it does not need any further evidence than this bill to prove that the Administration intends to hold perpetually the Philippine Archipelago.

The Senator from Massachusetts also gave in his accustomed scholarly and logical manner an explanation of the details of the bill; and yet even he, before he came to the end of his argument, devoted quite a part of it to justifying the action of the American Army in the conduct of the war by the plea that they were driven into these scenes which would have done credit to an Alva, a Tilly, a Piccolomini, an Illo, or a Tertzky, or a Wallenstein three centuries ago, as one after another they led imperial forces in the Netherlands and Germany, with the avowed purpose of shooting to death religious liberty. He said they were justified by reason of the fact that the Filipinos themselves had begun uncivilized warfare, and that it was by revenge for this that the American Army had gradually been drawn into it. It will be seen by this that the majority has been forced from its original high position to intrench itself behind the plea of necessity.

If there were needed at this time any proof that imperialism is advancing its banners and sapping the very foundations of our liberty, it can be found in the contentions upon this bill by the majority.

The great danger to a republican form of government is the increase of executive power, invested with the command of a regular army. I have made this assertion before, and I now repeat it, though doubtless it will be said that I am not only attacking the Army, but the administration of civil government in our own country as well. I believe the time has come when the American people should once more be awakened.

The time has been when they were resting under the baneful influence and torpor of national sleep, when it took the hammer stroke of approaching revolution to awaken the conscience of our people. It may be so now, and I believe it is so now. In this time, when there is entire forgetfulness of our struggle for liberty, when the Declaration of Independence is sneered at and the Constitution violated and set aside, it is time that there should be men who have the moral courage to speak the truth and give the needed warnings. That the legislative branches of the Government are slowly but surely parting with their preponderance in the Government is a fact which can not successfully be denied.

That the Executive power can, by persuasion and judicious application of the party lash, force the Congress of the United States to adopt measures which are in themselves apparently unjust, upon the declaration of the majorities in both branches, has been evidenced of late in several sessions of Congress. And, sir, in the passage of this bill under the whip there is another exemplification of the same fact, and there will be yet another before the close of this session—I look forward to it now—when Executive power will enter this Chamber and cause a departure by many Senators from what is now their deep-seated conviction that they should adhere to the principle of protection and not entirely surrender it to the policy of reciprocity.

Not only is it done, but many seem to be eager to rush forward and obey the mandate of the chief. In my humble judgment, we are fast advancing to the time when it will be possible in this country for a Chief Executive, vested with his almost boundless power, to call to his aid the Army and enact the selfsame scene which Cromwell did in England when he appeared with his soldiers and prorogued the Rump Parliament.

You may smile at this, but evidences of its coming are beyond question. Executive power and the Army; these are the two dangerous elements. Doubtless I shall be severely reproved for sounding the warning and proclaiming the truth.

In combination with this increase of Executive power it is sought to make the Army a sacred thing that should not be touched by the criticism of the civilian. Is not this the spirit of the majority in the Senate now?

I for one reserve to myself the right to criticise what I deem to be wrong anywhere in any branch of the Government. I believe it to be my duty, and for this reason I have made the charge that the Army is sought to be idolized, its officers encouraged to despise the civilian, and taught to deem themselves the only essential feature of the Government—aye, the sacred thing which must not be touched in any way whatever. Its guilt must be condoned, its crimes defended, and any man who feels and speaks otherwise is criticised as being in sympathy with the insurgents in the Philippines and disloyal to his own country. I am quite willing to accept the decoration of disapproval of my course by this element of our political and national life.

That our Army has in this war been guilty of reprehensible conduct no Senator, I trust, upon this floor will attempt to deny. It is not my purpose to produce a mass of testimony. It is unnecessary. It has already been done. By evidence which dare not be disregarded it has been proven that we have departed from the civilization of to-day and in our method of war returned to the barbarism of Attila and Alaric. We have adopted the tactics of Arminius, the Cheruscan chief, when, to preserve his nationality, he lured the Roman legions into the Teutonic forests and there surrounded, defeated, and annihilated them.

Not a single Roman soldier of the Five Legions escaped. That was a barbarous war, and yet Arminius did not approach, in his savage warfare, to the orders, to the mandates, and to the action of the American Army in the Philippine Islands. There were no children there, but there were women, and he preserved their lives that they might take back to Rome the news of the annihilation of the Roman army. Rome had forced her yoke upon every nation in Europe until she reached those Teutonic forests and the Caledonian Mountains. There she met with reverse, a reverse which ended in her total discomfiture and downfall by the very forces which she had attacked.

It has been proven that our Army has resorted to the killing of the wounded and of defenseless prisoners. It has been proven that our Army was ordered to shoot and kill men, women, and children, whether armed or nonresisting. It has been proven that provinces have been destroyed and converted into wildernesses and the inhabitants who were not under arms driven together into camps of concentration. It has been proven that the methods of warfare disapproved of in Weyler have been adopted and executed by the American Army.

Sir, when I make these statements doubtless I will be accused of being in sympathy with the Filipino. Be it so. I am in sympathy with the Filipino. I am in sympathy with any people anywhere upon God's footstool who desire liberty and have the courage and manhood to stand up and fight for it and die for it.

I am not in sympathy with the American Army when it is to be used for base and infamous purposes. But, sir, is the Army responsible for the conditions of the struggle? To a certain extent, yes. And yet, no. I am not unfair enough to charge the Army with the entire responsibility. The soldier in the ranks must come and go as he is commanded. He must execute the orders of his superior. The noncommissioned officers are of a higher grade and degree, but they must obey the subaltern officers.

The colonel of the regiment commands that regiment, and yet in turn he has to obey the orders of the general of the brigade, of the division, or of the Army corps in which that regiment happens to be. These generals in turn are in obedience to and must carry out the commands of the commander in chief of the Philippines. So that, after all, upon him would seem to rest the responsibility for this conduct, but not entirely so. He would not dare to carry on a war which was in contravention of the policy of the home Government.

General Bell would not have issued his famous or rather his infamous order, and General Smith would not have dared to send forth a proclamation which is a disgrace forever to the American Army and to American civil government as well. Who is responsible for General Bell and General Smith? The commander in chief of the Philippine Islands. Who is responsible for him? Some men may act for themselves when they are in an inferior capacity, and I doubt not some of them have.

We have had references to General Bell, General Smith, and to General Funston in this debate as exemplars of the American Army officers in the Philippines. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BURTON] felt himself called upon to defend General Funston against what he deemed unjustifiable criticism from some of the Senators of the minority. I desire to state that I can not indorse all that has been said upon either side concerning these matters. I can no more agree with the terrific outpourings of wrath which have come from the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] than I can give assent to the many harsh and drastic sentences of the Senator from Kansas. I do not think that either expresses what should be the sentiment of our people concerning this question.

General Funston is a brave soldier of the Republic. It is most unfortunate that his courage and valor, his intrepid bravery, have been called into action in a war that is foreign to the higher and better aspirations of the American people. I admire him for his achievements in the Philippine war, while I must condemn the cause for which he fought. I can not but give praise and laudation to the splendid spirit which made him one of the great features of that war. He showed he had a dauntless bearing, and he gave evidence of almost reckless bravery upon yonder bridge in the far-off archipelago, in the river, and on the farther shore, when he made the brilliant dash and attack upon the enemy. So much I think should be granted him by all.

I admire him, too, for the reason that he was not himself guilty of conceiving the plan in which forgery and its attendant criminal proceedings were used to entrap Aguinaldo and secure his capture. General MacArthur, I think, seems proud of the strategy thus employed and claims it as his own. I believe that Funston was too brave a man to indulge in the coward's trade of forging letters and documents. He did execute the orders of his superior officer, and if there is anything creditable in the whole of that shameful act of war upon the part of this great nation it is the manner of Funston's carrying it out.

But, sir, the soldier must not forget that he is only the servant of the Republic, and not the critic and mentor of its governing power. Whatever he has in honors he owes to the American people through the executive power and the confirmation of the Senate of the United States.

These honors were freely given him, yet when he returns to his native land crowned with laurels, if laurels they be, he so far forgets himself that he endeavors to enact the roll of hero and to call to task the men who have been chosen by their States to regulate one part of the legislative and another part of the executive power of this land.

To be a hero requires more than physical courage or military strategy. To be a hero there should be a sentiment of right, of justice, of mercy. To be a hero a man must have the ability not only to do battle courageously, but to honor the institutions of his country and bow in humble submission to the power which he serves. These qualities General Funston does not seem to possess. It ill became this officer to speak disparagingly of those who are opposed to the Philippine war, and he reached the very height of his insolence when, at a banquet in New York, he uttered the following words, and was applauded by many of those who sat with him. Doubtless, inspired by the fumes of wine, he forgot his position and dared attack those whose duty and task it is to examine into national affairs and to pass upon matters of great consequence in the Government of the country:

I read from the report of his remarks as quoted to us by the Senator from Kansas, his apologist. These are the words that General Funston used. They are at the conclusion of his address:

> I do not want to say anything brutal, but, as I say, the Army feels bitterly about this business. I have no quarrel with the man who thinks that we should not at first have taken the Philippine Islands; I have no quarrel with the man who thinks a whole lot of things, but who does not say too much about it now; but all those men who have been writing and talking about this thing and keeping this warfare alive and in the field to-day—I say that I would rather see any one of these men hanged—hanged for treason, hanged for giving aid and comfort to the enemy—than see the humblest soldier in the United States Army lying dead on the field of battle.

These are the exact words as they are reported to us of this great hero, General Funston. I for one will not stand idly by without protest and without resentment and listen to the words which have been uttered by a man like General Funston when they read as they do in the RECORD. I take him as an example of what this war has produced in the Army.

At the beginning of the contest I said there were dangers that the Army, after they had robbed a weaker people of their liberties, would be so impregnated by the spirit needful to that occupation that the day would not be far distant when they would forget themselves and endeavor, under an imperialistic law, to crush the power that made them.

You can not use an army in a war which is to subjugate, subdue, and exterminate a liberty-loving people without throwing upon liberty itself the weight of this action, and it will recoil upon you, and the very armies that once fought for the Republic will lend themselves willingly to repeat the infamous attacks upon the very citadel of liberty at home which they were permitted to make in foreign lands. The danger is that, having learned this lesson, he ceases to be an American in the sense and in the way in which we understood it in the last century.

General Funston is an example of this condition in his native land. It is true that he has been cautioned, I may say even reprimanded, by his superior officers for the use of this discourteous and unwarranted language. His tone, as evidenced, is one that bespeaks the mind that has already learned to despise civil authority. No man will deny that in the day when the military power assumes greater dignity and takes upon itself the censorship of civil life there is danger to the Republic.

Funston! I care but little for his opinion concerning those who oppose this war. It is a matter of indifference to me. It bears no more importance than the yell of any one of the members of an infuriated street rabble, but he asserts a doctrine which, if accepted in this country, means that freedom of speech has already disappeared and Senators and Representatives must have a care, for he presents to us anew the Jesuit doctrine that we "may think as we please, but must not think aloud." Think of the spectacle of an officer whom we have created, upon whom we have showered honors, so far forgetting himself as to speak in this manner.

If he voices the spirit of the American Army, then it is well that cognizance should be taken of it at once. Aye, as a Senator of the United States I am at liberty, according to the Funstonian theory, to think as I please, but I must be silent in the Senate Chamber and allow the liberties of my country to be taken away without raising a voice in their defense. I may think that the war is wrong, but I must not openly given expression to that thought.

This man is not a hero. He has so small a conception of the country which he has served that the very courage which he has shown serves him but little, and while I admire that courage I must say that I detest and despise the spirit which he has shown at home. And, in my judgment, if in his sober senses and calm afterthought he can give expression to such sentiment it is full time for the military authorities to authorize a court-martial for conduct unbecoming an officer of the American Army. And, sir, in this matter I have not spoken for the Filipino nor adverted to the wrongs which he may have done toward him, but I have spoken for my own countrymen and for the time-honored institutions which every man should reverence.

A hero! Do not let us so belittle the word. There are few real heroes in the world. Let me, if you please, give you the portrait of a great national hero of this country, as it was drawn by Charles Phillips, the British orator, in his splendid speech at Dinas Island in the Lakes of Killarney in the early part of the last century:

> Washington.—No people can claim, no country can appropriate him. The boon of Providence to the human race, his fame is eternity, and his residence creation. Though it was the defeat of our arms and the disgrace of our policy I almost bless the convulsion in which he had his origin. If the heavens thundered and the earth rocked, yet when the storm passed how pure was the climate that it cleared; how bright in the brow of the firmament was the planet which it revealed to us! In the production of Washington it does really appear as if nature was endeavoring to improve upon herself, and that all the virtues of the ancient world were but so many studies preparatory to the patriot of the new.
> Individual instances no doubt there were, splendid exemplifications of some single qualifications. Cæsar was merciful, Scipio was content, Hannibal was patient. But it was reserved for Washington to blend them all in one, and, like the lovely chef d'œuvre of the Grecian artist, to exhibit in one glow of associated beauty the pride of every model and the perfection of every master. As a general he marshaled the peasant into a veteran and supplied by discipline the absence of experience. As a statesman he enlarged the policy of the Cabinet into the most comprehensive system of general advantage; and such was the wisdom of his views and the philosophy of his counsel that to the soldier and the statesman he almost added the character of the sage. A conquerer, he was untainted with the crime of blood. A revolutionist, he was free from the stain of treason, for aggression commenced the contest and his country called him to the command. Liberty unsheathed his sword, necessity stained, victory returned it. If he had paused here, history might have doubted what station to assign him, whether at the head of her citizens or soldiers, her heroes, or her patriots.
> But the last glorious act crowns his career and banishes all hesitation. Who, like Washington, after having emancipated a hemisphere, resigned its crown and preferred the retirement of domestic life to the adoration of a land he might be almost said to have created!
> How shall we rank thee upon glory's page,
> Thou more than soldier and just less than sage?
> All thou hast been reflects less fame on thee,
> Far less than all thou hast forborne to be.
> Such, sir, is the testimony of one not to be accused of partiality in his estimate of America. Happy, proud America! The lightnings of heaven yield to your philosophy! The temptations of earth could not seduce your patriotism.

If Funston be a hero we must find a different class from this. Even to the young Briton, standing amidst the beauties of Killarney's Lakes, there had come an appreciation of the character of Washington and the true heroism which it exemplified. A true hero hath liberty to unsheath his sword, necessity to stain it, and victory to return it to its scabbard. He will never draw it in inglorious cause or press it against those who are weak and unprotected. He will not stain it by the blood of those who seek that which nature and nature's God entitles them to.

And, sir, I desire to call attention to the closing sentence of this eloquent tribute:

> Happy, proud America! The lightnings of heaven yield to your philosophy! The temptations of earth could not seduce your patriotism.

Is that the tribute we deserve now? Have we not, for a shadow and a dream, imperiled the essence of our liberty, and have we not by the temptations of conquest and imperial aggrandizement been seduced from our patriotism?

What does Washington, the great hero, say? I wish to cite a hero concerning war. With prophetic vision he saw what might be coming to his country, and he reaches the case of Funston after a century has passed. "He being dead yet speaketh." Washington, in his Farewell Address, used these remarkable words, and they apply to the situation of to-day as though they had been written in this hour:

> It is important likewise—

He says in this address—> that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position.

The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions by the others, has been evinced by experiments, ancient and modern, some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If in the opinion of the people the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

It would seem that this hero, a century ago almost, had some idea of what other heroes in a later age and of a different class might attempt to do with the American people.

But, sir, generals like Funston and Bell and Smith are not responsible in the end, nor are generals like Wheaton and Otis and MacArthur. They are responsible to the home Government. What is that? First in order would be the General of the Army. But he in this instance is free from all blame; and why? From the beginning of the Spanish war the military coterie subscribed to by the Administration prevented any attempt of his to command the Army. His counsel was not accepted. His mode of warfare was cast aside.

Sir, what is the one bright spot concerning the ending of the war begun against Spain? Take all the American military operations. It is the subduing of Porto Rico. The Administration did not wish General Miles to gather laurels in Cuba or in the Philippines, but the time came when they needed some one to command an army in Porto Rico. General Miles went there. What was the result? By his policy of peace, with an army back of him, he induced the Porto Ricans, without a single engagement and, I believe, without the loss of a single man, not only to submit to the American Government, but to ask that they be permitted to come into the body politic of this nation. His splendid proclamation, which does him honor and credit as a man, as a civilian, and as an officer, was that which inspired the Porto Ricans in this direction. True it is that afterwards the promises made by the General were broken. True it is that the Porto Rican was much disappointed in his hopes and aspirations for local self-government and for the privilege of statehood.

General Miles was prevented from active participation in the war in the Philippines. He saw the progress of the war. He saw, as every American must see, even though he be not in the Army and views the struggle from a distance, and was impressed with the fact that we were losing sight of all that is defensible in war. He saw the false representations that were made, and after months of consideration this superb soldier, knowing what war is, determined to make an effort on his own account, as General of the Army, to gain the ear of the Administration and bring about peace in the Philippines. He offered to go to the Philippine Islands and promised to bring order out of chaos and out of most horrible war peace.

But, sir, the Administration treated him with contempt, refused his counsel, and were almost persuaded when he spoke, as an American officer should, in defense of another brave American officer who was deprived of his just honors, to commit upon him the greater indignity of forcibly retiring him from the Army. No, General Miles, the brave soldier who knows when a battle is necessary, who knows how to fight as a Christian soldier should, was not to be given charge of the Philippine war. The Administration preferred such officers as Bell and Smith and their compeers in subordinate command, and Otis and MacArthur as commanders in chief.

Sir, who was the authority above and beyond General Miles? The Secretary of War. And he is responsible for this condition, because it was known at the war office, but the Department did not take prompt action. All the orders issued by these generals were known. All the action taken was known at the war office, and it did not take the action that was necessary to prevent the furtherance and the carrying out of this evil policy.

But even he is not responsible for all. There is above him another power, a higher power—that of the President of the United States, Commander in Chief of the armies. He became responsible when, without the action of Congress, he began this unconstitutional war. He was responsible for the actions which were committed for a while to a certain degree and extent, but his responsibility ceased after a while.

Above the President of the United States there is in this country another and a higher power. It is the people of the country. Every four years they are appealed to, and by the battle of the ballots they decide who is to be the Chief Executive and what kind and manner of policy shall be pursued in this country. The war was going on. Congress sat silent. Then the appeal was made to the country. What was the result?

The ballot was taken upon this issue It was whether or not the permanent acquisition of the Philippine Islands was a constitutional, just, and fair measure; whether or not it was well for the American people further to engage in it, or whether we should reverse our policy and return to the policy which we had followed for over a century. What was the result?

Notwithstanding the fact that this was the great issue at stake, that it was so pronounced in every section of the Union, the people were well content, though they had eyes not to see and were diverted from the great issue. They placed the dollar above the man, and in that election, obscuring the great issue which should have been voted upon, they were induced by the majority party to vote upon a principle and an issue that had been decided for many, many years to come in the campaign of 1896.

But the people were led away, and upon the shoulders of the majority of the people of the United States rests the responsibility for the war since that election. There it belongs after all. It does not rest with the soldier in the ranks; it does not rest upon the commissioned officer; it does not rest upon the colonel commanding his regiment, the subordinate general, or the commander in chief, or the War Office, or the President, but it rests upon our people and upon them altogether. Sir, the people, being led away from the issue, did not decide the issue in my opinion, but they did decide for the time being in favor of the policy which had been inaugurated, the policy of foreign conquest, the policy of colonial acquisition and expansion.

I for one am not chargeable with such a vote, and I for one decline to bear or help to bear the responsibility of the majority of the American people. I enter my solemn protest against it. I did enter it against it. I would not allow my party to dictate, and stood against it because I believed that if the American people reelected the then President of the United States it would be an indorsement of this policy; and it was an indorsement of the policy, and the evils that have resulted are thus chargeable.

I for one must not bear it with you, but declare here and now that since I entered into political life and came from the House to the Senate it has been my effort to avert at every step and every stage of the march which has been entered upon the catastrophe that awaits us at the end, and for that reason I speak to-day to finally enter my solemn protest against this responsibility. I do not know that I shall speak upon this subject again. I would not have done so now but for the fact that it appeared to me that in this last act, in the crowning of this inglorious and unfortunate departure from our principles, I should at the end proclaim, as I did at the first, my adherence to the Government of the Fathers, my adherence to that great maxim of the Nazarene philosopher when he said, "Do unto others as you would have them do unto you;" my adherence to the noble precepts of that immortal document which, whether you will adhere to it or not, will live among the nations of the earth forever as the noblest declaration of principles ever enunciated by any nationality in the history of the world; my adherence to the Constitution of the United States—a document that can have no force saving and alone that which is given it by the lawful obedience of the people whom it is to govern.

I heard the other day an avowal in the Senate Chamber that finds a responsive echo in my heart, when the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS], in the debate upon a question which has not yet been decided, said that "for himself he preferred to hold in his hands and place himself upon the shreds of the Constitution which has been left us."

Oh, it may be sneeringly said that the man who wants to prevent progress appeals to the Constitution. That may be so at times, but I would rather that progress should for a time be at a standstill than see it advance over the prostrate body of the supreme law of this land, especially when there is at issue the underlying principle, the corner stone of the foundation upon which the superstructure of our nationality has been erected.

I adhere to the Constitution, but more than that I stand in sorrow in the hour in which I see our people departing from the policy which has made us not only great in wealth but great in manhood, and respected the world over as the embodiment of liberty and of freedom. I stand in sadness to see the surrender of this high character in our people, and yet it is so.

There is with us now a materialism that has forgotten the past and its honors, is blind to the future and its possibilities, and seeks only the gross advantage of the present hour; that is ready to sacrifice the illustrious history of a century for the questionable success of the present moment. But, sir, this is a Government, on the other hand, of a majority, in which the minority must submit to the majority, and in the moment of that submission, made by reason of insufficiency of strength further to make honorable contention and contest, the majority becomes responsible. Upon their heads and shoulders may "lie the white man's burden," so far as this nation is concerned. I for one will not carry it longer, and you must assume it.

Sir, beyond the question of the conduct of the war, above the methods employed by the Army, there is another question as to the war itself—whether or not there should have been war. I have always said, and say now, that there should have been no war whatever.

Before I began my address the Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] proclaimed that he wished spread upon the RECORD and printed an account given by the press of the beginning of free government in Cuba. Sir, I said, and I say now, that without any war, without the loss of a single American life, without the expenditure of a single American dollar, without all the difficulties and dangers that have come, Cuba would have been free three years ago and she would have had a much larger measure of freedom than she has now. You have given her freedom, but you have hedged that freedom about and hemmed it in and limited it by your amendments so that in a short time possibly you may bring her back by force of arms to an embrace she does not desire. So much for that war.

But now for the war that came out of that, one of the evils of the Pandora's box which I said three years ago would be opened upon the nation. I have amply and at different times explained my reasons for that faith, and I have seen these reasons justified by the passage of time and the evidences it brought forth. If we view the strange and remarkable pictures which have been painted on the canvas of time since 1898, I see a justification more and more enlarged and intensified for the opinion I then held and the cause I then espoused. Sir, as the months and years and the intent and the purpose of the Administration are made clear by the silent language that these pictures speak, I am more than ever convinced that there was not a noble motive, but that of foreign conquest and colonial expansion.

I do not intend again to advert in detail to the beginning of the Cuban war, nor to relate the history of its progress and conclusion. That has been done heretofore. Nor shall I describe the strange fortunes which found an American fleet in the Orient and caused us to make war there. It would be useless to again recount the struggle of the Filipinos against the Spaniard; the magnificent victories obtained; the conquest of Luzon by native troops under Aguinaldo and his generals; the turning of friendship into hate, and the breaking of national promises. So far as we were concerned I shall not speak of the first clash of arms, so often misrepresented, and yet, perhaps, some few words should be said upon it.

After the battle of Manila Bay the great American Admiral lay before the city. He had no soldiers to land upon Philippine shores and take the city. He must wait until they came across the Pacific from the Golden Gates of our Western slope. But, sir, he had no fear of disaster in the meanwhile, for his allies were fighting bravely in the interior, defeating the Spaniards and driving before them, from all sections of Luzon, those whom they did not kill or capture. When the American army arrived there was nothing for them to do against the Spaniards save to receive the surrender of Manila.

The Filipinos occupied all the island of Luzon saving the city and a cordon extending across the narrow neck of land from water to water about 8 miles from the walls of Manila. They had alone, without the aid of the American army, reconquered their native island from their masters and oppressors. They had been taught to look forward to the coming of the Americans as the advent of their day of liberty and self-government. What other expectation could they have. The Admiral had prevailed upon them to recommence the struggle, aiding them by guns, ammunition, and money, giving them consideration as allies, encouraged them to fight for a larger measure of freedom than they had contemplated in the previous insurrection. They had heard that the Americans sought to aid all peoples in their desire for freedom.

The history of a century had given abundant proof of it. The Cuban war was but another example of their high purpose. What other expectation could they have than that the Americans would plant the standard of self-government for them, when they had valorously done their part? But they were mistaken; in a most rude and ungenerous manner they were awakened from their trust and dream. The American Administration and Army fell before the temptation of the position in which they were placed. Who tempted them? Two agencies are most prominent. The Spanish and the English. The Spaniard hated the Filipino; he had spent three centuries in attempting their conquest, and had now forever lost the islands. He hated the American who had caused this loss, as also that of Cuba. He could not obtain revenge by force, he must obtain it by poisoning the mind of the American against the Filipinos and causing the Filipinos to lose faith in American promises by their unfavorable action.

The Spaniard gave information of the fabulous wealth hidden and undeveloped, of the splendid opportunities for trade, of the open door to China, and many other suggestions of interest of like nature.

The Briton had begun his unrighteous plot against the South African Republics to rob them of their country and liberty. He knew he could not stand alone in this aggression, therefore English diplomacy urged the American Republic to engage in the same undertaking against the Filipino. They whispered we had become a world power and must act accordingly by adopting her colonial policy.

We succumbed to temptation. We turned upon our allies. But, sir, we could not attack them without some charge or complaint. We claimed the islands by cession and purchase from Spain. The Filipino claimed his own inheritance by right of reconquest from Spain.

He had not been permitted to enter his capital city that he had not conquered, but the generosity of his allies should have permitted him to do so. He resented this, but bore it patiently. Then came days of idleness, in which the two armies faced one another. The work intended for the Americans had been done by the Filipinos before they came. The island was no longer occupied by the Spaniard. The Americans occupied the line of the Spaniards and the Filipinos occupied the position they had held when Manila surrendered.

Then the attack. I do not know who was the attacking party. I can not tell who committed the offense of firing the first shot. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DEBOE] made a most labored effort to prove in detail that the Filipinos had fired upon the Americans. On the other hand, there is evidence as substantial, and perhaps more so, that an American soldier fired the first shot against the Filipinos.

Mr. PATTERSON. Will the Senator from Maryland permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. WELLINGTON. With great pleasure.

Mr. PATTERSON. I think that in the investigation before the Committee on the Philippines the testimony of General MacArthur has put that question at rest forever. His statement is in brief that on the night of February 4, at about 8.30 o'clock, a patrol guard of four Filipinos crossed the forbidden line, when they were shot at by the American outpost; that two of the Filipino soldiers were killed, and that the two living retreated to the blockhouse, and then a general firing commenced along the line.

Mr. WELLINGTON. I have heard of that evidence, and I believe that that is the real truth concerning the first attack.

Mr. PATTERSON. It is General MacArthur's own statement.

Mr. WELLINGTON. But, sir, be that as it may, as I said, shots were exchanged. But what harm would a few shots exchanged between wandering parties of either army have done? They might have disturbed an evening, but should they cause a war that the commanding general of the American army says would be continued until there was abject submission or extermination of the Filipino?

The American commander determined upon moving on the Filipino lines and the war began. A change had come o'er the spirit of our dreams, and instead of giving the Filipino the self-government he had expected and desired we determined to hold him subject to our policy and inflict upon him such a government as we chose to grant. After this exchange of shots it will be remembered that the Filipino commander endeavored to hold communication with the American general, but it was impossible to do so.

Now, sir, with this explanation before us, how can any fair-minded American justify the beginning of that war and its continuance year by year, each campaign furnishing more of the infamous story, every chapter of which is revolting? First, the wholesale slaughter of the Filipinos; second, the burning and pillaging of their cities, towns, and villages; third, the infliction of tortures, not for revenge, but to extract information; fourth, the order for concentration camps; fifth, the most infamous of all proclamations ever issued by an American general, or, I believe, a general of any other nation at any time, which commanded the shooting down of men, women, and children, whether they were armed and resisting or otherwise.

It has been attempted to justify the conduct of the war in the Philippines upon our part, not only by the assertion that its cruelties were the result of Filipino atrocities, but that Great Britain was employing the same tactics, in which we are engaged, in South Africa.

For the first part of this contention I can say that the Filipino must not be judged by our standards of civilization and morality. He is an Oriental and it is his nature, after centuries of oppression, which he believed had been ended by the coming of American power, to resent in his own way the breach of faith to which he has been subjected and the train of events which have arisen from it. There could be little astonishment if he had, in his resentment and disappointment, revenged himself upon the American soldiery. But, sir, the fact is that he did not do so.

Have a court of inquiry if you will and cite the generals of your army before it and they will tell you that the Filipinos did not begin the atrocities, but that they were begun by the American army itself. It was not the Filipino. There may have been in some part of the island bandits who committed acts of wrong and crime, as there are bandits in every country of the world who transgress the law, but the Filipino army did not commit any outrages of this kind. They had considered us as their friends. They were loath to part with us. They were kindly in their reception of us, and I repeat they were not guilty of the charge which was made against them.

It was only after the American army had transgressed that, adding to his resentment and his disappointment the loss of his liberty, his country, the loss of his people, the Filipino, too, may have determined at some point to pay evil for evil. It was only after the wholesale shooting of his people that the spirit of revenge was loosened and the Filipino, too, tried to tread the path which had been marked out for him by the greatest nation in Christendom.

Sir, it had been the boast of this country that we warred only in defense of our liberties, and ever in a generous manner toward our foes, but the scutcheon of our national banner has been stained and we can no longer say—

Swordless foeman's blood or life
Ne'er dyed our gallant blade.

For the second part of this contention I maintain that Great Britain has been guilty of a national crime in her flagrant abuse of the war power in the Transvaal, in the Orange Free State, in Natal, and in Cape Colony, but whatever may have been her course she never pretended to the doctrine we have professed, and we can not hide behind her error. We stand on higher ground; we stand alone.

It seems to be most appropriate in this hour to recall the gaunt figure and melancholy countenance of Abraham Lincoln, when he stood upon the battlefield at Gettysburg in 1863, and said:

Fourscore and seven years ago our fathers brought forth upon this continent a new nation, conceived in liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal.

Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure. We are met on a great battlefield of that war. We have come to dedicate a portion of that field as a final resting place for those who here gave their lives that that nation might live. It is altogether fitting and proper that we should do this. But in a larger sense we can not dedicate, we can not consecrate, we can not hallow this ground.

The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here have consecrated it far above our power to add or detract. The world will little note nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us, the living, rather to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have so nobly advanced. It is rather for us to be here dedicated to the great task remaining before us, that from these honored dead we take increased devotion to that cause for which they gave the last full measure of devotion; that we here highly resolve that these dead shall not have died in vain; that this nation, under God, shall have a new birth of freedom, and that government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from the earth.

Is the speech of the great emancipator and martyred President still remembered by our people? To my mind it is the embodiment of the highest patriotism and eloquence produced by any American statesman. It contains the epitome of what should be the aspiration and striving of our people. Are we following the path pointed out, or do we realize the true import of the closing sentences of this memorable address? Do we join the spirit of this immortal in the invocation addressed to the Divine Power which rules and guides the destiny of nations? If we do so remember; if we join in his patriotic exclamation; if we have faith in his prophecy and a desire for the consummation of his wish, can we so far wander from the path he has marked as to justify this war?

Charles Sumner, the great Massachusetts Senator, who was ever in the forefront of the battle for the highest ideals of national life, in his oration on The True Grandeur of Nations, which was an appeal for universal peace, speaking of war, uttered the following memorable words:

I need not dwell on the moral debasement of man that must ensue. All the passions of his nature are unleashed like so many bloodhounds and suffered to rage. All the crimes which fill our prisons stalk abroad, plaited with the soldiers' garb and unwhipt of justice. Murder, robbery, rape, arson, theft are the sports of this fiendish Saturnalia, when

"The gates of mercy shall be all shut up
And the fleshed soldier, rough and hard of heart,
In the liberty of bloody hand shall range
With conscience wide as hell."

Such is the foul disfigurement which war produces in man; man, of whom it has been said, "How noble in reason, how infinite in faculties. In form and moving, how express and admirable; in action, how like an angel; in apprehension, how like a god!

Thus he spoke in the intensity of his feeling of war—war under any condition, even when justified. And in conclusion he spoke of the mission of this country among the nations of the earth:

It is a beautiful picture in Grecian story that there was at least one spot—the small island of Delos—dedicated to the gods and kept at all times sacred from war, where the citizens of hostile countries met and united in common worship. So let us dedicate our broad country. The temple of honor shall be surrounded by the temple of concord, so that the former can be entered only through the portals of the latter; the horn of abundance shall overflow at its gates; the angel of religion shall be the guide over its steps of flashing adamant; while within justice, returned to the earth from her long exile in the skies, shall rear her serene and majestic front. And the future chiefs of the Republic, destined to uphold the glories of a new era, unspotted by human blood, shall be "the first in peace and the first in the hearts of their countrymen."

Such was the magnificent picture his imagination furnished of the future of his native land. As I read these words I look about me upon the cold fact that stares us in the face, upon the immutable truth which we have failed to hold safe as a nation, I feel sorrow and chagrin that Charles Sumner should have been so far mistaken in his countrymen, and if perchance from that far-off country, unknown to mortals, it be his fortune to look upon us now, how deep must be the sorrow of his spirit for the dereliction of those who should have upheld the aspirations he indicated and brought into fruition the hopes which made his latter days, surrounded by the beauty and the glory of the vision which cast off party bondage and dwelt in the higher atmosphere of noble citizenship, satisfied and happy.

Now, let me quote his closing words as an appeal for the ceasing of war whenever it be possible:

But while we seek these blissful glories for ourselves let us strive to extend them to other lands. Let the bugles sound the truce of God to the whole world forever. Let the selfish boast of the Spartan women become the grand chorus of mankind, that they have never seen the smoke of an enemy's camp. Let the iron belt of martial music which now encompasses the earth be exchanged for the golden cestus of peace, clothing all with celestial beauty. History dwells with fondness on the reverent homage that was bestowed by massacreing soldiers on the spot occupied by the sepulchre of the Lord. Vain man! to restrain his regard to a few feet of sacred mold. The whole earth is the sepulchre of the Lord; nor can any righteous man profane any part thereof. Let us recognize this truth, and now, on this Sabbath of our country, lay a new stone in the grand temple of univeral peace, whose dome shall be as lofty as the firmament of heaven, as broad and comprehensive as the earth itself.

Have we reached the high ideal of the noble Sumner? Or do we hunger and thirst for the woes of war as he has so graphically described them? It must indeed be the latter if we long continue in our present course.

Do we seek "these blissful glories for ourselves" and "strive to extend them to other lands?" If we do so strive we have indeed a most strange way of pursuing the national highway to this end. Are we not endeavoring the opposite in this accursed war, in which we have not been content with the usual terrors, but go beyond the ancients in the carnival of blood and make infamous the American name by enactment of every license of the unbridled passions?

Daniel Webster, the great expounder of the Constitution, whose name and fame will be as imperishable as the English language, in one of his great orations described the duties, tasks, and dangers of this nation. His great mind seemed to grasp the pathway of the generations that were yet to come, and he saw the development of our people through the years and decades unborn. In words which should bear to us a message of solemn import he described the struggle for liberty by the American people, its triumphant conclusion, the advancement and development of the country, and the debt of gratitude for our heritage of liberty which we must pay by sending to all the ends of the earth the message of self-government.

The great wheel of political revolution began to move in America. Here its rotation was guarded, regular, and safe. Transferred to the other continent from unfortunate but natural causes, it received an irregular and violent impulse; it whirled along with a fearful celerity, till at length, like the chariot wheels in the races of antiquity, it took fire from the rapidity of its own motion, and blazed onward, spreading conflagration and terror around.

We learn from the result of this experiment how fortunate was our own condition and how admirably the character of our people was calculated for making the great example of popular governments. The possession of power did not turn the heads of the American people, for they had long been in the habit of exercising a great portion of self-control.

Although the paramount authority of the parent state existed over them, yet a large field of legislation had always been open to our colonial assemblies. They were accustomed to representative bodies and the forms of free government; they understood the doctrine of the division of power among different branches and the necessity of checks on each. The character of our countrymen, moreover, was sober, moral, and religious, and there was little in the change to shock their feelings of justice and humanity, or even to disturb an honest prejudice. We have no domestic throne to overturn, no privileged orders to cast down, no violent changes of property to encounter. In the American Revolution no man sought or wished for more than to defend and enjoy his own. None hoped for plunder or for spoil. Rapacity was unknown to it; the ax was not among the instruments of its accomplishment, and we all know that it could not have lived a single day under any well-founded imputation of possessing a tendency adverse to the Christian religion.

It need not surprise us that under less suspicious political revolutions elsewhere, even well intended, have terminated differently. It is indeed a great achievement—it is the master work of the world—to establish governments entirely popular, on lasting foundations; nor is it easy, indeed, to introduce the popular principle at all into governments to which it has been altogether a stranger. It can not be doubted, however, that Europe has come out of the contest in which she has been so long engaged with greatly superior knowledge, and in many respects a highly improved condition. Whatever benefit has been acquired is likely to be retained, for it consists mainly in the acquisition of more enlightened ideas.

And although kingdoms and provinces may be wrested from the hands that hold them in the same manner they were obtained; although ordinary and vulgar power may in human affairs be lost as it has been won, yet it is the glorious prerogative of the empire of knowledge that what it gains it never loses. On the contrary it increases by the multiple of its own power; all its ends become means; all its attainments help to new conquests. Its whole abundant harvest is but so much seed wheat, and nothing has been ascertained and nothing can ascertain the amount of ultimate product.

Under the influence of this rapidly increasing knowledge the people have begun, in all forms of government, to think and reason on affairs of state. Regarding government as an institution for the public good, they demand a knowledge of its operations and a participation in its exercise. A call for the representative system wherever it is not enjoyed and where there is already intelligence enough to estimate its value is perseveringly made. Where men may speak out they demand it; where the bayonet is at their throat they pray for it.

When Louis XIV said "I am the state" he expressed the essence of the doctrine of unlimited power. By the rules of that system the people are disconnected from the state; they are its subjects; it is their lord. These ideas, founded in the love of power and long supported by the excess and abuse of it, are yielding in our age to other opinions, and the civilized world seems at last to be proceeding to the conviction of that fundamental and manifest truth—that the powers of government are but a trust and that they can not be lawfully exercised but for the good of the community. As knowledge is more and more extended this conviction becomes more and more general. Knowledge, in truth, is the great sun in the firmament. Life and power are scattered with all its beams. The prayer of the Grecian combatant, when enveloped in unnatural clouds and darkness, is the appropriate political supplication for the people of every country not yet blessed with free institutions.

> Dispel this cloud; the light of heaven restore;
> Give me to see—and Ajax asks no more.

We may hope that the growing influence of enlightened sentiment will promote the permanent peace of the world. Wars, to maintain family alliances, to uphold or cast down dynasties, to regulate succession to thrones, which have occupied so much room in the history of modern times, if not less likely to happen at all, will be less likely to become general, and involve many nations, as the great principle shall be more and more established, that the interest of the world is peace, and the first great statute that every nation possesses the power of establishing a government for itself. But public opinion has attained also an influence over governments which do not admit the popular principle into their organization. A necessary respect for the judgment of the world operates, in some measure, as a control over the most unlimited forms of authority.

It is owing, perhaps, to this truth that the interesting struggle of the Greeks have been suffered to go on so long without a direct interference, either to wrest that country from its present masters and add it to other powers or to execute the system of pacification by force and, with united strength, lay the neck of Christian and civilized Greece at the foot of the barbarian Turk. Let us thank God that we live in an age when something has influence beside the bayonet and when the sternest authority does not venture to encounter the scorching power of public reproach. Any attempt of the kind I have mentioned should be met by one universal burst of indignation; the air of the civilized world ought to be made too warm to be comfortably breathed by anyone who would hazard it.

It is, indeed, a touching reflection that, while in the fullness of our country's happiness we rear this monument to her honor, we look for instruction in our undertaking to a country which is now in fearful contest, not for works of art or memorials of glory, but for her own existence.

I desire to impress these words upon the Senate. It was the great Webster, under the shadow of Bunker Hill monument, addressing his fellow-countrymen upon the mission of the American nation, who used these words:

> We look for instruction in our undertaking to a country which is now in fearful contest, not for works of art or memorials of glory, but for her own existence.

That was in 1825, in speaking of the Greek people when they were attempting to cast off the yoke of their Turkish masters. What did he then say? He said:

> Let her be assured that she is not forgotten in the world; that her efforts are applauded, and that constant prayers ascend for her success. And let us cherish a confident hope for her final triumph. If the true spark of religious and civil liberty be kindled, it will burn. Human agency can not extinguish it. Like the earth's central fire, it may be smothered for a time; the ocean may overwhelm it; the mountains may press it down; but its inherent and unconquerable force will heave both the ocean and the land, and at some time or other, in some place or another, the volcano will break out and flame up to heaven.

Ah, he spoke truly. When the spark of liberty is once kindled, no matter how many armies may attempt to smother it, no matter how long the war against it may last, in the end the people who aspire to liberty and deserve it will succeed in establishing and maintaining it.

Now, listen further to what Webster said. These words seem applicable to the present situation:

> Among the great events of the half century we must reckon, certainly, the revolution of South America; and we are not likely to overrate the importance of that revolution, either to the people of the country itself or to the rest of the world.

He was speaking of the revolt in the Spanish colonies in South America.

> The late Spanish colonies, now independent states, under circumstances less favorable, doubtless, than attended our own revolution, have yet successfully commenced their national existence. They have accomplished the great object of establishing their independence; they are known and acknowledged in the world, and although in regard to their systems of government, their sentiments of religious toleration, and their provision for public instruction they may have yet to learn, it must be admitted that they have risen to the condition of settled and established states more rapidly than could have been reasonably anticipated.
> They already furnish an exhilarating example of the difference between free governments and despotic misrule. Their commerce at this moment creates a new activity in all the great marts of the world. They show themselves able, by an exchange of commodities, to bear a useful part in the intercourse of nations. A new spirit of enterprise and industry begins to prevail, all the great interests of society receive a salutary impulse, and the progress of information not only testifies to an improved condition, but constitutes itself the highest and most essential improvement.

These were the words of Webster, the great expounder of the Constitution. They were delivered three-quarters of a century ago. The spirit of the Revolutionary patriots had not entirely disappeared. Their ideals were still bright and lustrous before our people, and the great statesman, as he described the progress of the American nation toward eventual liberty and self-government, tells us, in a measure, the wishes and ambitions of the Revolutionists themselves. But more important for the present are his reflections upon the events which were then transpiring in other countries.

Wherever men longed for liberty, there the spirit of Webster clasped hands with them and bid them godspeed. Whether it was in Greece, where a struggling people was seeking to be freed from its Turkish masters, or in South America, where the Spanish colonists were in revolt and created one state after another founded in imitation of our own, upon both hemispheres he saw and lauded these undertakings. His greeting to Greece was, "Let her be assured she is not forgotten in the world, that her efforts are applauded, and that constant prayers ascend for her success."

For the South American States he expressed unbounded sympathy, and described accurately and prophetically their progress toward free government and their gradual advance from the low estate in which they then stood. The South American colonies of Spain in the beginning of the last century stood no higher in the grade of human civilization than do the Filipinos of to-day. It is an exact comparison; it is a second picture of the same situation. They are a hundred years later by circumstances, but the Filipino in Luzon and in the greater islands is as much entitled to self-government as were the colonists in South America when they rebelled against Spain and founded those free States.

In 1825 the American people sympathized with their brethren in all the ends of the earth when they desired liberty, and with pæns of exultation heralded their opinion of the right of those peoples to govern themselves; and it will be observed that Mr. Webster, as he continued, proclaimed to the world not only that we welcomed self-government everywhere, but that "we were not propagandists, and that wherever other systems are preferred as being thought better in themselves, or as better suited to existing conditions, we leave the preference to be enjoyed."

If we apply this principle to present affairs, how can we continue this war of subjugation further? Either it must cease and we must acknowledge the wrong we have done, or we must depart now and forever from the high estate which we once held as a people and a nation.

If we recognized the right of the Greek to aspire to freedom; if we recognized the right of the South American States to cast off Spanish allegiance and to oppose Spanish power, that they might have self-government of their own choosing, then how can we in this day deprive the Philippine people of the self-same consideration?

Mr. President, I have not quoted to you from the newspapers of to-day, and there can not be any quibbling as to their political opinions. I have sought to trace the spirit of our institutions and the desire of our people in the past. I have caused you to hear the voice of the dead who yet speak, of the men who fashioned our policy in the past, who caused the nation to live, who sent it forward upon its advancement, who preserved it in the day of the crucible test and left our heritage unimpaired to the present generation.

I have from the first declared that the war must cease. I emphasize that declaration now, and reiterate and reaffirm the faith which has been abiding with me from the first hour of the new policy. I, for one, demand the withdrawal of the American troops from the islands and the granting to those people the self-government to which they aspire.

It has been said that while the opposition oppose the war, while the minority exclaim against it, it offers no solution to the difficult problem. More than three years ago I proclaimed the same proposition and declared the same faith which I hold to-day. If it had been followed then, peace would long have reigned in the Philippines.

But, Mr. President, it is of no avail to speak of the mistakes of the past. Rather let us do at this moment what to defer would be another error. Do not hesitate; do not attempt to untie the knot, but cut it by announcing to the Filipino people that the original intention will be adhered to, that they themselves shall govern themselves; give them an opportunity to gather together in a convention or a congress such as our forefathers held in the City of Brotherly Love, which caused the Declaration of Independence, enacted the Articles of Confederation, and later still in a convention which gave us the Constitution.

Give them an opportunity to meet in the different provinces and governments, to select their representatives, to hold counsel together, and to formulate the plan of their own government. If they prefer a dictator let them have a dictator; they are responsible, and let us remember we are not propagandists. If they desire a different form of government from ours, let that be their concern, for the government must be of their own choosing and by their own consent. Help them if you will, direct their faltering steps toward the goal they seek to attain, but do not longer continue this war under the pretense that it is done for the benefit of the Filipino people, either for their civil or religious liberty. They are capable of self-government. There will be many disappointments. There will be troublous times. There will be, as there was in South America and as there was in our own land, sedition, revolution, rebellion, but out of them all they will work their own salvation and at last rest in peace under beneficent laws well adapted to their own conditions which they themselves have enacted. There can be no loss to us and great gain is certain.

If you speak of trade, sir, the English and the Germans are reaping the benefits of trade while we are attempting conquest. Let us endeavor to retrieve the error of the past; let us endeavor to make these people our friends, and, whether there be financial advantage or not, we can afford to be just and generous.

Had this policy been adopted $500,000,000 of treasure could have been saved, 10,000 young Americans would still be living and ready to do the work for which they were intended in their own native land, and God's sun would be shining in the fair islands of the east upon at least 100,000 more Filipino people who would be living and breathing and free. The burthen which we bear would be lighter, and the stains of blood upon our hands would not be there. But let us endeavor to wash them out by the high and noble purpose which demands greater courage than that of going into battle—the courage of frankly acknowledging that an injustice has been done, and that, God willing, as a nation we are willing to make amends, to pay the debt, and retrace our steps.

Withdraw your troops. It will not be necessary to keep them there many months; let them come back from the Orient ere it be too late, ere there be a sapping of the health, a brutalizing of the mind, and a lowering of the spirit and morals of these men. Let us endeavor to forget the horrible history which this war has written upon the islands and our share in the wretched condition. Let us return again to our own land, to our own institutions, to the principles which made us beloved, and all will be well.

But, sir, why these words of appeal? They are as fruitless as the idle song of an empty day. The wrongs will not be retrieved or undone. You of the majority are determined upon your course. You are impatient to pass this bill, which will be but another step on the road that leads to national dishonor, and perhaps eventually to the loss of our own liberties. You have already arranged for the passage of this bill. I am against every paragraph and sentence of it, because I believe no such legislation should be had. Yet I believe that in order to impress my views it is necessary to show that I have examined the measure article by article, paragraph by paragraph, and I find it to be in opposition to what I consider the fundamental principles of our Government. It is, I fear, too late to obliterate the legislation of the past. The first and desperate step was made in the passage of the Philippine revenue bill. This but fastens upon us further complications.

The import of the first clause of this bill is of an extraordinary nature. By it Congress approves the action of the President of the United States in creating the Philippine Commission, and authorizes said Commission to exercise the powers of government to the extent and in the manner and form and subject to the regulation and control set forth in the instructions of the President to the Philippine Commission. Further, that the islands shall continue to be governed by said Commission, and that all laws hereafter passed shall have an enacting clause, as follows: "By authority of the United States be it enacted by the Philippine Commission."

To my mind the President never had the right, under the Constitution, to create the Philippine Commission, and it seems to me rather late to ask the Congress to legalize the action of the President. The President of the United States had no right to attempt government in the Philippine Islands save and alone under his power as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States. As such, holding the islands by the military power, he could appoint military governors and set up a military administration. Under the Constitution he could do nothing more. Yet, after the war had begun and the military power was supreme in the Philippines, he attempted to, and did, set up another government, which he called a civil government. We have here an astonishing problem of a military authority establishing civil government when the exact reverse should be the case in a republic, where the military power must always be subservient to the civil power, unless where martial law has been proclaimed.

I am quite willing that the Chief Executive should enjoy all the power vested in him by the organic law of the land. And while at times I believe this supreme military power of which he is possessed is an element of danger, yet there are many arguments that may be made for its continuance in the Chief Executive. But he should not at any time, or under any circumstance, endeavor to usurp, for a civil government which he has builded outside the Constitution without the authority of the Congress, functions which are not for him to perform in his civil character. There was no constitutional provision for the creation of the Philippine Commission; it was an unconstitutional act, and I am not in favor of attempting to legalize in any way or manner the usurpation of the Executive nor to continue in power, for civil purposes, the Commission thus created, nor to recognize their right to make further enactments of law under the name and title indicated.

The Philippine Islands are, by the decision of the Supreme Court, a part of the United States. That being true, the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands who can fulfill the conditions of citizenship are entitled to be citizens and as such to provide for their local self-government, subject only to the authority of the law-making power of the United States. Until the time comes when they can erect territorial government there can be no exercise of power of the President of the United States except as Commander in Chief of the Army, and I again emphasize the contention that he must either act in one capacity or the other—either as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States or as the Chief Executive of the civil power.

Let us go a step farther. If military power still exists upon the islands then the jurisdiction of civil courts must necessarily be restricted, and whatever courts there be must be of a Territorial character, appointed by the President of the United States and confirmed by the Senate.

Passing the third section, which approves the action of the President of the United States, heretofore taken by virtue of the authority vested in him as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy concerning the tariff dues and taxes, I would say that such action was evidently within his province and does not need the approval of the Congress of the United States.

We now come to the fourth section, which is an important addition to the position that I have heretofore maintained. During the debate upon the passage of the Philippine revenue bill I contended that the act was unconstitutional, because it endeavored to tax a people who had become a part of the United States; who lived in a territory of the United States; taxed in a manner different from that which was made use of in the various other Territories and States of our Government. But it was contended in opposition that a person might be an inhabitant of territory of the United States and yet not a citizen of the United States. Pursuing the argument further, I held that under the Constitution we had no right to hold dependencies and make subjects of men who should be citizens, but the majority was inclined to intrench itself behind the doubt. The bill was passed and we taxed the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands in a way different from other portions of our territory.

In the present bill the declaration is made that all inhabitants of the Philippine Islands continuing to reside therein who were Spanish subjects on the 11th day of April, 1899, and then resided in the Philippine Islands, and their children born subsequent thereto, shall be admitted and held to be citizens of the Philippine Islands, except such as elect to preserve their allegiance to the Crown of Spain.

Mr. President, if there was any doubt as to the position occupied by the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands as to their qualifications for citizenship, of their being citizens of the United States, this bill will at once remove it, for it declares that certain persons are citizens of the Philippine Islands. The Philippine Islands have been decided to be territory of the United States, and, therefore, being citizens of the Philippine Islands, they are citizens of the United States of America, and your previous action of taxing them in the former bill is now unconstitutional, if it was not then, if this bill pass, and it will pass, of which there is no doubt in my mind.

Citizens of the United States are persons who become citizens of the several States and Territories under due form of law and have the requisite qualifications for such citizenship. To become a citizen of the United States, unless I reside in the District of Columbia, I must first become a citizen of a State or Territory. I am a citizen of the State of Maryland, and by virtue of that fact I become a citizen of the United States. The Filipino, if he have the qualifications of citizenship, is primarily a citizen of the Philippine Islands, and again, by virtue of that citizenship, he is a citizen of the United States of America; and if this is admitted the tariff act passed a few months ago is, what I then declared it to be, unconstitutional and unjust.

Beginning with section 5, we have a plan of the substitute government to be founded at such time as may please the President of the United States upon such conditions as he may require; in other words, a government such as we may choose to grant when, according to our judgment, the islands are fit and ready for the establishment of popular representative government.

The Filipino is entitled to self-government when he in his own opinion is fitted for it, and he is entitled to such a government as he may choose for himself. This is in direct opposition to the terms intended to be given by this bill, which grants him only the right of government at our pleasure and of such a character as we may choose for him.

I have endeavored to state this in simple, plain language, so that he who runs may read and understand. I oppose this portion of the bill because it is in direct antagonism to the principles which we permanently established in the Declaration of Independence. The proposition we make in this bill is such a proposition as the Czar of Russia might make to his subjects. The Great White Father tells his children that he will give them so much of self-government as in his opinion they are fit to have and capable of enjoying. This means just so much government as he is willing to give them for his own benefit, or any government whatever, even a military despotism, if that be to his advantage.

If we were a government such as Russia, which is an autocracy, instead of a republic; if we held the opinion that we have, as has the sovereign of all the Russias, the right to dominate and control the persons, property, life, and privileges of all of his subjects, then it would be absolutely just to pass such a bill as we are now engaged in debating; but, being, as we are, a democracy, based upon the proposition that all men are equal, and that self-government receives its powers by the consent of the governed, our position presents a marked contrast, and we must give a different solution to the problem. It is our duty to grant to the Filipino immediately, if he desires it, as quickly as it can be accomplished, self-government. Not at a time to be set by us, but when he demands it. Secondly, it must be a government of his own choosing, and not of our creation. He may not select a government that, in our judgment, is of an elevated character such as our own, and yet it may be, for his environments and conditions, a better government than ours.

We must not forget that the Filipino belongs to the East, and not to the West. The further fact of his being capable of maintaining an existence, of perpetuating his race in the Tropics, where it is impossible for a white man to do so, shows that he is physically different, and, as a logical consequence, he can not be mentally the same as we are. I have held from the beginning of the controversy that we should not claim authority, that we should not have the islands a moment longer than was necessary to establish law and order, prevent foreign interference, allowing the gathering of a representative convention, the formation of a constitution, and the establishment of a government such as was selected by the inhabitants of the archipelago; and when this time arrived it was our duty to depart, to leave a portion of the world in which we should never have sought power either by consent or conquest.

These conditions and requirements are substantially set forth in the substitute of the minority for this bill, intended to be offered by the Senator from Utah. I am not sure that even this substitute grants all that is desired for the Filipino, for I believe it is defective in that it places in the hands of the President of the United States the authority to issue a proclamation announcing that armed resistance has ceased. There is no time set when this shall be done, except by the condition that armed resistance shall have ceased.

I believe that if the substitute of the minority were passed that armed resistance would cease at once, but the question is, When will such reports be made as would cause the issuance of the proclamation of the President. This substitute, however, comes nearer my idea than anything that has been offered at this time. I shall therefore give it my vote and thereby register my protest against the bill presented by the majority.

But, sir, there is another complication by the Administration in self-government for the Filipino in the near future, as demonstrated by the additional sections of this bill, relating as they do to the lands of the Philippine Islands classified as timber lands, mineral lands, farming lands, and lands for other uses. I doubt not that most of the rules and regulations provided therein would be advantageous and effective, but once and for all I believe that the Filipino himself should deal with the lands that belong to him. If the Philippine government to be established chooses to enact a homestead law granting a hundred and sixty acres of land to individuals, let them attend to that for themselves.

I do not believe that they will grant 160 acres, because it has been demonstrated by those who know the fertility of the Philippine Islands that one-quarter of that much would be an abundant concession to any Filipino as a homestead. Nor do I believe that they would concede to any great company 5,000 acres of land, because this would, in a very short period, allow a few individuals forming different corporations and companies to hold the larger part of the best lands in Luzon or the other great islands; but if it be the will and pleasure of the Filipino, under his own government, to do so, it is a matter that he himself should arrange and for which he himself must stand responsible if harm should come to the public good. But if this bill passes and we continue to hold the archipelago perpetually, as I believe it is the intention of this Administration to do, it will be one of the many misfortunes with which we shall burden that people.

I know that we have no power here to strike out these provisions or to amend them in such a way as to protect Philippine interests, and therefore there must be submission to the will of the majority in this, as well as in other matters at issue.

Again, a further provision concerning these lands is the authority to purchase the lands of religious orders and others and to issue bonds for the purchasing price. I can see no greater harm in a religious body holding a great body of land than in another corporation doing the selfsame thing.

I believe both are wrong, and for that reason I would prevent the large holdings of corporations under this act, and for that reason also I should be pleased to see arrangements perfected by which the religious orders, principally the friars, in the Philippine Islands could be divested of their immense holdings of valuable agricultural lands. But, sir, how is it to be accomplished? There is a legal way in which it can be done by the Philippine government, if it should exist, and that is by making payment for the lands to the friars, obtaining from them their title in it. But this bill intends to acquire the real estate of the religious orders by exercising the right of eminent domain. They will not buy from the friars the lands they hold at a price to be accommodated between the two parties who buy and sell, but propose to exercise the right of eminent domain—that is to say, of condemning it at their own price and setting it aside as public land.

Now, the great question arises, would any government which acknowledges any system of modern law have a right to condemn private property for public purposes and then, as is proposed to be done by this bill, sell it again to private individuals? I do not believe such a right could be exercised; but I presume there is but little use to discuss law or constitution, rules or regulations, methods or customs in this matter. The majority wills that the bill pass. And whenever the Constitution stands in its way it is quietly brushed aside, and whenever there be advantage in obliterating or for the time being covering up the law it must be done for the purpose of carrying out this scheme of government.

Following these provisions come the schemes relating to franchises which, in my judgment, are most dangerous and reprehensible in many parts. But I pass them over, for it is necessary that I should hasten to a conclusion.

I desire, however, to advert to two propositions contained in the bill, which relate to finances. It is proposed to establish in the Philippine Archipelago two standards of value, the one for the bondholder and the other for the people. In that section which provides for the acquirement of lands of religious orders there is power granted to the Philippine Government and the Commission to issue bonds for the payment of the purchase price of these lands. The bonds are payable, principal and interest, in gold coin of the United States. In a latter section of the bill there is the establishment of the silver standard of value, the unit being the Philippine silver dollar.

When the bill was first read I reserved the right, at the proper time, to oppose or to amend these sections relating to the establishment of the silver standard. I have been, and am now, in favor of the gold standard of value, and I was therefore inclined to insist that if our Government claimed sovereignty over, and perpetually held, the Philippines, that the standard of value there should be the same as upon the mainland of the United States. But, sir, I desire to confess that upon investigation I was forced to the conclusion that it was not possible, without great endamagement to the Philippine people, to force upon them the gold standard. And, sir, if this be true, why inflict upon them a law which demands the issuance of bonds which will be payable in the gold standard of value?

There is only one reason. I have seen through the whole of this bill, though there is no positive declaration of it, and that is, that it is the intention of the present Administration and of the advocates of this bill to perpetually hold and dominate the Philippines. They know that these bonds will be taken in the United States, because they are to be sold at par and bear 4½ per cent interest, that will be practically guaranteed by the United States, and naturally the holders of the bonds desire a guaranty that it shall be paid in the gold standard of value. The Filipino is not considered in the matter. While they have left to him the silver standard, they insist that his debt must be paid in the gold standard or its equivalent.

I believe these two enactments taken together will cause more disturbance and do more harm to the Philippine financial system than there would have been in the single proposition of the silver standard and bonds payable in that standard of value.

But, sir, I dare not longer detain the Senate upon these interesting, though they be futile, arguments concerning the various propositions of this bill. In its consideration I have at least found the answer of the majority and the Administration as to their purpose regarding the archipelago. The policy of drifting has ceased. One principle at least is now abundantly proven by circumstantial evidence: Whatever may happen, the Administration does not intend to grant to the inhabitants of the archipelago that which is their God-given right and for which they are struggling.

I attempted to force a declaration upon this some three years ago, but without avail, and from that time until now there has been a hesitancy to avow the purpose of the Administration, and there has been nothing but equivocal declarations concerning the matter.

The provisions of this bill, however, so clearly indicate the purpose to establish an arbitrary government and hold the lands, liberties, persons, and privileges, as well as the lives, of the Filipinos in charge, considering them subjects of the empire and not citizens of the Republic, that I hoped that my countrymen would awaken from the dream of conquest, from the infatuation of territorial expansion, the increase of her commerce, at the expense of truth, justice, equity, but I was mistaken.

I frankly admit that my confidence was misplaced, and the ruling power of the country to-day, upheld by a majority of her citizenship, is willing to barter away the glorious heritage of a century of honorable achievement for the mess of pottage which consists of a group of islands far away in the Pacific, which have caused us to expend half a billion of treasure and thousands of American lives, and yet we have them not. But we are ready to proceed to any extremity to finish their conquest. Our descent has been most rapid.

If five years ago any man would have declared that we would send our fleets, men, and money to the Torrid Zone to conquer an unwilling people and put a yoke of unauthorized government upon them he would have been esteemed insane. And if he had, in addition to that, predicted that the nation would be willing to part with its honor, to stain its hands with innocent blood, he would have been declared a traitor. And yet, in the mutations of time, even though it be but five years, there has come this transformation. The nation seems to be mad, drunken with success. It turns itself from the ancient landmarks and goes down into the valley of dishonor to gather false glories and riches that will prove dross and not pure gold.

Be it so, Mr. President, the responsibility must rest with them who commit these acts in defiance of every principle of law, of rule, of honor, and conduct which we have known in the past. Though it be of no effect, I register my protest. Though I know the battle is lost and the victory is won by the Administration, I am willing, if need be, to stand alone and still enter one plea that you listen to the warning ere it be too late. God's ways are wondrous ways. Under His providence and divine benediction we have risen and wrought as no nation hath risen and wrought in all the annals of time. But you have disregarded the high principles which, under God's favor, produced these conditions, and who may tell but in a little while the wrongs of the Filipino will be avenged upon us at the hands of the very instruments which we have made use of for their defeat, their humiliation, and tortures.

I trust it may not be so, and I hope that in some way, ere the final seal shall have been placed upon this action which you now contemplate, some interposition may arise and call a halt upon the path which we are now treading. Has honor departed, and is generosity dead among us? If so, then indeed we have reached the level when we can march abreast with England in her attempt to despoil a free, a courageous, a brave people, and, after a century and a quarter, find ourselves clasping hands with the natural enemy of this country, congratulating each other upon the joint accomplishment of an infamy which they attempted upon us in 1776, and which we justify in 1902.

Mr. President, I oppose this bill for the reason that it is contrary to the aspiration which induced the patriarch of the Revolution to begin his struggle against England. I oppose this bill because it is in contravention to every principle of that great charter of civil liberty, which was the document of the Continental Congress and proclaimed the independence of the United States. I oppose this bill because it is at variance with the expressed commands of the Constitution and with the spirit of the laws which have been enacted under it.

I oppose this bill because it is in direct opposition to the opinions held and expressed by Washington, the Father of his Country; by Webster, the expounder of the Constitution; by Sumner, the champion of peace, whose voice in the antebellum days awakened the conscience of our nation; of Abraham Lincoln, the greatest of all Americans and Republicans, the savior of the Union and the emancipator of a race. I oppose this bill because it is an act of usurpation upon the part of the American people as against a weaker nation whom they should cherish, love, and establish in self-government.

I oppose this bill because it attempts to do for the Filipinos those things which they can better do for themselves, relieving us of the responsibility and charge of self-interest. I oppose this bill because it will continue an unconstitutional, unnatural, and infamous war, the conduct of which has brought our nation to shame. I oppose this bill because it will fasten upon us a policy which is alike unjust to ourselves and the Filipinos. I oppose this bill, finally, because in my judgment it is antagonistic to the laws of nature and nature's God and to the equality of peoples which we have ever maintained.

I intended to speak somewhat longer, but time has sped and I have already taken more than I should. Therefore I gladly leave the matter with the Senate.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, when I yielded the floor on yesterday I was engaged in the discussion, and had about concluded it as I then intended, which grew out of the reconcentrado order and the reconcentrado camps in the Philippine Islands. I do not know that I should return to the subject but for some things which were said by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] after I had yielded the floor. I may misunderstand him, but I do understand the Senator from Ohio in the view which he presents to practically maintain two propositions. One is that the order of General Bell is in harmony with the rules of civilized warfare, and the other is that as practiced the reconcentrado policy in the Philippine Islands is one of humanity and mercy and not one of cruelty.

In furtherance of this proposition the Senator from Ohio reads the order of General Bell of December 8, and draws from the words of that order a conclusion that the purpose of the order was not to inflict cruelty upon the people of Batangas Province and other provinces which were within the territory of his brigade, but that really the purpose of the order was to protect the people against bandits, guerrillas, and brigands. I am sorry the Senator is not in his seat, because if I misstate him I would be glad to be corrected. That I think is the plain import of the language used by the Senator, and the Senator reads the order of General Bell in substantiation of the construction which he put upon it. I will read again the part read by the distinguished Senator from Ohio:

To all station commanders:

In order to put an end to enforced contributions now levied by insurgents upon the inhabitants of sparsely settled and outlying barrios and districts by means of intimidation and assassination, commanding officers of all towns now existing in the provinces of Batangas and Laguna, including those at which no garrison is stationed at present, will immediately specify and establish plainly marked limits surrounding each town bounding a zone within which it may be practicable with an average-sized garrison to exercise efficient supervision over and furnish protection to inhabitants (who desire to be peaceful) against the depredations of armed insurgents.

After going on a few lines prescribing the extent of the limits, the order resumes:

Commanding officers will also see that orders are at once given and distributed to all the inhabitants within the jurisdiction of towns over which they exercise supervision, informing them of the danger of remaining outside of these limits, and that unless they move by December 25 from outlying barrios and districts, with all their movable food supplies, including rice, palay, chickens, live stock, etc., to within the limits of the zone established at their own or nearest town, their property (found outside of said zone at said date) will become liable to confiscation or destruction.

The words "confiscation or destruction" evidently imply that all movable property which may be useful or desirable will be forcibly seized and carried away, and that all other property, immovable or movable, after that date found in the proscribed zone of death will be destroyed.

I have not read the entire order. It is not necessary, because it has already been read since I have been upon the floor and is in full in the RECORD. Those particular parts of the order are the parts from which the Senator from Ohio draws the conclusion, as stated by him yesterday with very great emphasis and earnestness, that this was a humanitarian order, and that the purpose of it was to protect the peaceably disposed people of those provinces from the barbarities and cruelties of bandits and brigands.

It is true that the order uses this very strange language, when we come to construe it in connection with the remaining portion of the order:

Bounding a zone within which it may be practicable with an average-sized garrison to exercise efficient supervision over and furnish protection to inhabitants (who desire to be peaceful) against the depredations of armed insurgents.

The suggestion of the Senator from Ohio would indicate that the expedition of General Bell into the provinces named was in the nature of a merciful expedition, a sort of a Sunday-school expedition, if I might so term it, in which it was designed to protect good and peaceful people against the outrages of those who were nothing but outlaws. Why that should have been put in there it is difficult to imagine, unless it was the intent of the author of the order to produce the impression which the Senator from Ohio says he has received from it.

But if that be the case, I wish to call attention to what is a most remarkable fact. If the purpose of this order was to protect the inhabitants of these provinces from outlaws, ladrones, and brigands, how is it that the commanding general states a date beyond which it would be unsafe for the people to remain outside of these limits? If he is issuing an order for the purpose of protecting against outlaws, will it be pretended for a moment that the general had an agreement with the outlaws that they would permit these people to remain in safety until the 25th of December, and that if they did not get within certain limits by that time the outlaws would withdraw the agreement?

Is the limit of time against outlaws and the danger from outlaws, or is the limit of time against what General Bell intended that his armed forces should inflict on the people who remained outside of the zone? What other construction can possibly be put upon it? It says people must come within a certain time. The purpose is to protect them against outlaws. "You can stay out in safety until the 25th, but if you do not come in by the 25th your property is liable to confiscation and destruction." From whom? From the outlaws? No; clearly from General Bell. Seventeen days were given, and then on Christmas day, among a people to whom that day was sacred, all his forces of death and devastation were to be turned loose for the desolation and destruction by fire and sword of every person and thing found outside of the reconcentrado limits.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator say that everybody who did come within the lines marked out by General Bell suffered thereby?

Mr. BACON. No; I do not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Only the people who stayed out suffered?

Mr. BACON. I did not say who suffered or who did not. I am talking about what the order said would occur.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like to ask the Senator this further question, then. Does he understand these lines to exist now—does he understand this concentration camp to now exist?

Mr. BACON. I think I saw a statement to the effect that the order had been withdrawn, but that does not affect this question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I was simply calling——

Mr. BACON. I am talking about the order which was passed, not about the present existing condition.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Without intending to interrupt the course of the Senator's very able argument, I wish to call his attention to the fact that the lines have been disestablished, that the insurgents have been captured, that the insurrection has been suppressed, and that no person who came within the lines drawn by the Government has suffered thereby.

Mr. BACON. What has that got to do with the point I am making?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like to know what the Senator's point has to do with the question under discussion?

Mr. SPOONER. What is his point?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator from Wisconsin wants to know what is the Senator's point.

Mr. BACON. I will state it again for the benefit of both Senators. The Senator from Ohio on yesterday presented the proposition to the Senate that the purpose of this order was to protect peaceably disposed Filipinos from outlaws and brigands in that province.

Mr. SPOONER. That was one purpose.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Ohio went on and made that the exclusive purpose. The Senator was antagonizing the proposition which I had suggested that this order, read between the lines and taken in connection with the order which was issued on the very next day, meant but one thing, and that was that people within certain prescribed limits could be safe, and that outside of those limits life and property were to be destroyed. That was my proposition, and the Senator from Ohio was antagonizing that proposition. The Senator from Ohio said that, on the contrary, it was not intended for the purpose of reaching those who were hostile and who were antagonistic to the United States Government outside of those lines, but it was for the purpose of protecting those who were peaceably disposed and who might be outside, and who would be protected when they came inside of the lines. That was the proposition of the Senator from Ohio. He did not say it was the only purpose.

The Senator asks what is the point. The point I am making is that while that language is used in the first paragraph, the plain, unmistakable purpose is to warn people that if by the 25th they did not come within this zone, death and destruction would follow in all the area outside that zone. From whom? From the brigands or from the forces of General Bell? If from the brigands, by what right or what authority would General Bell assume to say that the brigands would allow them to be unmolested until the 25th, and that they must therefore stay beyond that date at their own peril? What other construction is there but the one that he intended that he who fixed the date should be the one who would inflict the penalty? There is none other. The Senator may laugh about it, but he will have to do something more than laugh to get rid of it.

Mr. SPOONER. To whom does the Senator refer?

Mr. BACON. To the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not laugh about it.

Mr. BACON. Well, the Senator smiled pleasantly, then. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPOONER. That is quite different.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. With very great pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Assuming the construction which the Senator from Georgia admits that he reads between the lines in General Bell's order, I should like to know whether the Senator from Georgia does not consider that order, in case the people within those lines have their liberty and are well cared for, a proper military order?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I stated yesterday and I repeat now that where the reconcentrado camp is properly provisioned and properly policed and parties are comfortable, the evil, the iniquity of a reconcentrado order is not so much what is within the zone of life, but is in the desolation in the wide area of death outside of it. It is the burning, the destruction of life, and the destruction of property outside of these prescribed limits which constitute the evil and make the principal horror.

Mr. SPOONER. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BACON. I never have failed, during my service in the Senate, to do so, and I am very glad to do so now.

Mr. SPOONER. That is true. Why does my friend from Georgia persist in calling this a reconcentrado order?

Mr. BACON. I do not know——

Mr. SPOONER. Is it not an attempt to fasten upon the American Army the odium of Weylerism in Cuba?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have stated as plainly as I could, and I think the Senator has not misunderstood me, that the purpose in my reference to this matter is not to fasten odium upon the Army, but in the hope that the people of the United States may see what are the inevitable consequences of this policy in order that they may abandon it.

I understand the Senator's question to be directed to a certain point on which I am going to answer him very frankly. The Senator's question would imply that my purpose is to use an odious term in order that the act may be more odious than it would be outside of the use of that term. I will say frankly to the Senator——

Mr. SPOONER. Pardon me; I do not say that.

Mr. BACON. I know the Senator does not say that, but I say the Senator's question implies it.

Mr. SPOONER. No, I do not say, and I will not say, that that is the Senator's purpose, but I say the use of that phrase, which is utterly inapplicable to this case, has the effect (I will not say the Senator intends it; I will not say that there are some who do not intend it) to fasten upon the army in the Philippines all the odium which attaches, and justly attaches, to the reconcentrado policy of Weyler in Cuba.

Mr. BACON. The Senator asked me originally why I did so and so, and if it was not to accomplish a certain purpose. That was his first inquiry of me, and it was for that reason that I put the construction upon his language which I then did.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will pardon me until I answer the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I thought the Senator was through with that, and I wanted him to answer the question which I put.

Mr. BACON. I will with great pleasure when I get through with this point. I want to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that—not being a Spanish scholar—I have always understood the word "reconcentrado," as used in Cuba, to mean the concentration of people in camps, and if there was any difference in my understanding of the word "reconcentrado" and the word "concentration" I had no consciousness of the fact. I want to say to the Senator that never until yesterday had I ever heard any other term used, when the Senator himself suggested "concentration."

I have not been present at any of these examinations, and I did not know that the word "concentration" was being used as a softening of the word "reconcentrado." It does not make any difference to me whether it is reconcentrado or concentration, if they mean the same thing, and if they mean differently I should be glad to be informed. If "reconcentrado" does not mean "concentration," and I can be shown how this is "concentration" and not "reconcentrado," I shall be very happy to use the word "concentration."

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me just a second, I shall be very happy to use the word "concentration," if I can always think to do so. It is a matter of habit simply with me. If the word "reconcentrado" is unpleasant to the ears of my friend, I will with great pleasure try to use the word "concentration." Now I will hear the honorable Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. The word "reconcentrado" is unpleasant to the ears of the Senator's friends.

Mr. BACON. Very well; I will use "concentration," unless I inadvertently say "reconcentrado."

Mr. SPOONER. The term "reconcentrado" stands for a policy of infamy. It stands for a policy of extermination. It stands for a policy in Cuba which shock the entire American people. Does the Senator contend that that was the spirit or purpose of the order of General Bell in the Philippines?

Mr. BACON. Well——

Mr. SPOONER. Or the effect of it?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator ought to ask me that question, and I will state to him the reason why.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator does not think I ought to ask it I excuse the Senator from answering it.

Mr. BACON. No; I will state my reason why before the Senator excuses me.

The Senator well knows that I could not answer some questions which would be asked me without appearing to assume to speak from personal knowledge, and I do not wish to be put in that position in this debate.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, well, if the Senator has any personal knowledge, I hope he will not conceal it.

Mr. BACON. No; the Senator is not right about that. I do not claim to have personal knowledge to the extent that his remark would justly impute, but the Senator, I am sure, will realize the fact that whatever I might say, whether I knew it or not from personal knowledge, might be and would be attributed by some to an effort on my part to appear as a witness, and that I am studiously avoiding, so far as concerns any act committed by anyone in the Philippines.

Now, if the Senator will consider it not to be inconsistent, I hope, before I conclude, to give some impressions which I may have as to conditions in those islands.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will pardon me, I hope if he personally knows of anything in the Philippines which the people of the United States ought to know he will in his place testify to it.

Mr. BACON. Well, the Senator will not be accommodated in that regard.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator ought to be.

Mr. BACON. No; I ought not, and I will not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator did not intend to evade——

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But, nevertheless, he did not answer the question which I put to him, and I should be pleased if he would answer it, since he is discussing the order of General Bell. I ask him if in case of the line drawn by General Bell the people brought within it were properly cared for, fed, and attended, does he regard that as a proper war measure?

Mr. BACON. Of course, bringing parties within the line, if they were properly attended to and taken care of, and if there is no destruction of property in consequence of it, where the circumstances required it, would not be an impropriety. I can conceive of circumstances which might require it within a small area, and in some such circumstances it might not be improper.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It would not be an impropriety?

Mr. BACON. No; not under the circumstances I have in mind.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, then, if the bringing of people within the lines and thus caring for them is a proper war measure, is not the reverse of that shield also true, that war may be carried on outside those lines, and therefore is not the whole order of General Bell, I ask the Senator, a proper war measure?

Mr. BACON. I think most distinctly and decidedly not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Why not?

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to state the case with some degree of continuity? I say it is not a proper measure because, as I read the order and as I understand the testimony taken before the committee, it was not simply an order which gathered within certain limits certain people who were thereafter well taken care of, but, as I have said repeatedly, it was an order which depended for its efficiency and for the accomplishment of that very purpose upon the destruction of property and of life outside of those limits. The concentration policy was dependent upon that for its efficiency. I discussed that yesterday and showed that the destruction of life and property outside of the reconcentrado limits was absolutely necessary in order to force people into the reconcentrado limits, and that without that destruction of life and property, and without the fear of that destruction, the reconcentrado policy would be a farce.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I can not yield to the Senator while I am answering his question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. But I did want to ask a question right on that point.

Mr. BACON. I am going to yield to the Senator in a moment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator will see why it is proper right here that I should ask him the question, if I am going to ask it at all.

Mr. BACON. Very well; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the people are all gathered in, which the Senator says is a proper measure, and those living outside of the line would be opponents of the Government, would be insurgents, would be hostile—that being the case, is it not a proper war measure to take against them?

Mr. BACON. But not to the extent of the burning of their houses and the killing of the people regardless of age, sex, or condition. Not to convert the country into a howling wilderness.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Do you find any such thing as that in General Bell's order?

Mr. BACON. I think that is what it means.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Oh!

Mr. BACON. I will read it, so as to show why I think so.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is reading between the lines.

Mr. BACON. No; I am not. I am reading the words and I will read the lines themselves, and I will show that they can mean nothing else but that, as I said on yesterday, the concentration order is one which can only be enforced by this rule which destroys everything outside of the lines; that it is impossible to go out and gather up all of the people and bring them in, as I said yesterday, as you would a drove of horses. You have got to apply to them some compulsion which will make them come in. When you prescribe limits, and say that these are the limits of the concentration camp, the method by which people are made to come in there is to say that outside of that they are not safe, and to say to them that "your houses will be burned and your property destroyed"—is that reading between the lines, or are those the words of General Bell? We do not have to read between the lines to find that.

> Commanding officers will also see that orders are at once given and distributed to all the inhabitants within the jurisdiction of the towns over which they exercise supervision, informing them of the danger of remaining outside of these limits.

What danger?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator think——

Mr. BACON. Let me conclude the reading. I have not finished reading the paragraph.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wondered whether the Senator did not consider that that notice to the people was very humane.

Mr. BACON. Well, that may be, but not in my opinion. I will begin the reading over again.

> Commanding officers will also see that orders are at once given and distributed to all the inhabitants within the jurisdiction of towns over which they exercise supervision, informing them of the danger of remaining outside of these limits, and that unless they move by December 25 from outlying barrios and districts with all their movable food supplies, including rice, palay, chickens, live stock, etc., to within the limits of the zone established at their own or nearest town, their property (found outside of said zone at said date) will become liable to confiscation or destruction.

From whom?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. From us.

Mr. BACON. Certainly; and by what influence is it sought to make these people come within this zone of life, as I have called it, in contradistinction to the zone of death? Is it not by saying that "within here is life and protection and out there is death and destruction; here is the hand that will inflict death and destruction?"

This order is not limited to men with arms in their hands; it is not directed only to men with arms in their hands; but it is directed to the entire population, and the order issued on the next day, on the 9th, which is practically a part of the same order, goes on to say to those to whom it is addressed, it may be a hard thing, but the innocent must suffer with the guilty; it may be a hard thing, but those who claim pleasant and friendly relations must not be considered; they must all fall within this order of destruction if they do not come in by the 25th day of December. Is not that so?

Does any Senator say that while it might be a legitimate matter to get within certain limits people who are thereafter to be kindly cared for, it is also legitimate that those who will not come within these limits shall be—regardless of whether they are combatants or noncombatants, men, women, or children—subjected to death because they will not come within those limits? Will it be said, because it may be right to bring within certain limits people who can be gotten there, that those who stay without shall not only have to do so at the risk of life but shall be told, in so many words, that their property is to be destroyed, and we know how destroyed—destroyed by fire?

Mr. President, has it come to this, that for the purpose of maintaining our sovereignty over that distant people, for the purpose of carrying out these ideas which have taken hold of us in the past four years, we are to go back to the age of barbarism, and, in order to defend our acts, to absolutely renounce the teachings of civilization and revert to the time when war was barbarity without any of the ameliorations of civilization? If so, Mr. President, that of itself would be curse enough to follow upon what we have done in this matter without looking for any other. If so, that of itself is sufficient to cause the American people to shrink back in horror from this path of blood.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. For a question, yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Just a question. I understood the Senator to say that he regarded it as proper for the military authorities to bring people within the lines as a war measure.

Mr. BACON. Properly, and under proper circumstances, but I do not mean thereby that their houses should be burned and their lives taken as a penalty for refusal to obey the order.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What I desire to ask the Senator is this: What would be the use of bringing people within the lines if the people without the lines are going to be treated precisely in the same way as those inside? What would be the use of doing this proper thing, which the Senator says is proper, if people outside of the lines are to be treated precisely in the same way as those inside?

Mr. BACON. I mean to say it is proper if it is done in a humane manner and under circumstances that require it; then it is all right, if there is no cruelty. I do not, however, mean to admit, but, on the contrary, I absolutely deny, the proposition that any inhumanity is justified to get them within the lines, for instance, by saying, "If you stay out you will be shot, regardless of sex or age, and your houses will be burned, therefore come in." Nobody admits any such proposition as that. It is, as I was about to say——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I think the Senator again very unintentionally, of course, evades the question. I understand the Senator again to say that it is a proper war measure to bring people within the lines if they are treated properly within the lines. The main thing, I ask the Senator, is, What would be the use of doing that proper thing if we were going to treat people outside precisely the same as the people inside?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, while it may be proper to get people within the lines in a proper way without inhumanity, I do not admit that that relieves a commanding officer in the field from all obligations to observe the rules of civilization and humanity as to those who do not come in.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the Senator a question, because I think his answer slightly susceptible of a double construction, which perhaps he did not perceive in the question—I do not mean purposely, but an actual double meaning. Does the Senator mean to say that the assembling of a whole population of a country into a reconcentrado camp is a proper war measure as a means of warfare upon them?

Mr. BACON. No; I do not. I mean that it may be a proper war measure as a means of protecting them, they being friendly, against the common enemy.

Mr. HOAR. Very well. Then is not the whole point of this thing—I expect to use the word "reconcentrado" when I discuss this question, if I have an opportunity to do so—is not the whole point of this thing whether they have undertaken to carry on this war against this people, who are said to be lawfully subject to our authority, by assembling them, taking them in whole districts away from their homes and dwellings, and crowding them into camps remote from where they live, on the penalty of having their property destroyed, and perhaps themselves slain if they do not go?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I expressly said that, of course, such measures must be in a proper case and not be accompanied by any inhumanity.

Mr. HOAR. But my proposition was in regard to the purpose——

Mr. BACON. I understand that.

Mr. HOAR. Let me put one other question to the Senator in order to bring out this thing. Is there any writer or authority on the law of nations or the law of war which justifies the getting of a whole population of a country into compact and close camps of this kind, taking them from their dwellings, as a means of warfare against them?

Mr. BACON. I do not think there is, and in order that the Senator may not misunderstand me I will make an illustration of one of the matters in my mind. I realize that there might be circumstances under which, not the whole population but the population of a particular neighborhood, might for a single purpose——

Mr. HOAR. To get them out of the range of the guns if a battle were in progress.

Mr. BACON. If there were going to be a battle, if the country was going to be within range of the guns, and men, women, and children, noncombatants, were to be exposed to that danger, I could understand very readily how an Army officer might require them to get within certain limits where they would be safe; but I do not recognize, as is suggested by the question of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], as I might have been understood to say, that it is a legitimate war measure to say to the people of a county or a province, "You have got to come within certain limits and do so by a certain day, and if you fail to do so, then all you who so fail will be subject to the destruction of your property and the loss of your lives." That I absolutely repudiate and condemn.

Mr. SPOONER rose.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me a moment, as he sees I am speaking with great difficulty from serious throat trouble——

Mr. SPOONER. I shall not interrupt the Senator at present.

Mr. BACON. This question has come to a very important stage; and if this is the feeling and the opinion of Senators, it is well that the country should know it, in order that the issue may be joined, that it is considered legitimate warfare to say to a people "Come within certain limits;" and then, as implied by the inquiry of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], it is equally legitimate warfare thereafter to treat everybody as hostile, and to destroy everybody and all the property outside of those limits. What else does concentration mean?

In what other way can the order of our general be construed when he says, "Come within certain limits by the 25th day of December, and those of you who do not obey this order take your lives in your hands and subject your property to destruction?"

Mr. President, I said that I understood the distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], who was not in his seat at the time I said it, to maintain the proposition that the order of General Bell was in accordance with the laws of civilized warfare. I said that, and if I misquoted him, I should be glad to be corrected in that regard.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator has substantially restated what I said heretofore. I was referring to what had been the practice of this Government ever since its beginning with respect to our Indians, for instance, and the well-known practice of other governments in conducting military operations under such circumstances.

Mr. BACON. If I correctly stated the Senator, that is all I desire to know at this time. The Senator from Ohio differs from the Senator from Massachusetts in that regard.

Mr. SPOONER. In what?

Mr. BACON. As to General Bell's order.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course no one would claim, I think, that it was justifiable to force a concentration of people within certain limits in order to make war upon them. I am not aware that there is any element of that kind in this case, but would it not be legitimate——

Mr. BACON. The Senator will observe that I was simply about to call attention to the fact that the Senator from Massachusetts did not agree with the Senator from Ohio, and now the Senator from Wisconsin returns to the question which I left.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; but suppose there is an outlying——

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield?

Mr. PETTUS. I make a question of order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the point of order which the Chair sustains?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. SPOONER. What is the point of order which the Chair sustains?

Mr. PETTUS. My point of order, Mr. President, is that the Senator from Wisconsin, without leave from the Chair, carries on a conversation with the Senator from Georgia, and it disturbs business, and it is very disagreeable at that.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understood the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] yielded to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], and the Chair thought the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] made the point of order that the Senator from Wisconsin did not address the Chair.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I am very sorry to "disturb business," but I am much more sorry to be "disagreeable" to the distinguished Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS].

Mr. BACON. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. In addition to that, I will apologize to my friend from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. But I hope the Senator will ask the question which he desires. I made no objection.

Mr. SPOONER. I supposed, as the Senator made no objection, that no one else would do so. I was about to ask the Senator whether it was not an entirely legitimate method of warfare, if there was an outlying inhabited district from which an enemy obtained food supplies and information, that an officer, after giving due notice, should order the concentration of the inhabitants within certain lines, and then destroy, after that date, all supplies and means of supplies from which the enemy had been from time to time supported?

Mr. BACON. I do not understand that it is legitimate warfare to destroy the private property of a country occupied by an army to the extent of making it useless to the people, nor do I admit that there is any rule of war by which can be done legitimately that which the Senator asks me if it can be done, and I ask the Senator, in his own time, to point to the precedent upon which he bases any such question. As the Senator states it, as every army draws supplies from its country the enemy is justified in destroying all the supplies in the whole country.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT of Connecticut). Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. Oh, yes; I yield, of course.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, am I recognized?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to be quite certain that I am neither "disturbing business" nor making myself "disagreeable."

The Senator from Georgia has asked me if there is any instance of the kind to which he has just referred.

Mr. BACON. I did not ask the Senator to give it now, because I think I ought to be allowed to continue my speech; but if the Senator has a question to ask I will yield.

Mr. SPOONER. No; I thought the Senator had asked me a question.

Mr. BACON. I will with great pleasure yield to the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I thought the Senator asked me a question?

Mr. BACON. I knew the answer would take some time; and so I asked the Senator to give it in his own time.

Mr. President, did anybody suppose when this Congress met that there would be any proposition advanced in either House of Congress that would sustain a mode of warfare such as is disclosed by the testimony which is now being taken by the Philippine Committee of the Senate? Does not everybody know that it would have been regarded with horror that we should have assumed for one moment that such things were within the range of the possible approval of Senators and Representatives?

Is it not a fact that since this debate began Senators have changed their positions with reference to this matter? Is it not a fact that when this debate began they, without exception, condemned these acts? Is there any Senator who had the hardihood to get up and approve them? Is it not because matters have gone to that point where the facts can not be disputed that they have either themselves got to join in the condemnation or to take a new position and to say that the acts are not to be condemned?

Why, we remember that when the Philippine debate was on under the former bill Senators on the other side resented with the utmost heat as a slander upon the Army the suggestion that such things were occurring. Well, if they were legitimate, why should they resent them as they did then, charging Senators on this side with slandering the Army and some of them almost with treason? Now, when the evidence has disclosed the fact as beyond dispute, they have advanced, where I never expected to see Americans advance, to a justification of such outrages and cruelties and barbarities as are shown by the testimony which is now being taken.

Senators go to the point of calling that civilized warfare which the perpetrators themselves of these acts condemn as not being civilized warfare. I say they condemn—that word is not proper—but they admit that that which they do is not civilized warfare, and they seek to justify their acts on the ground that they are fighting with those who are not themselves civilized.

I will read something to show that that is so. General Hughes was before the Committee on the Philippines, and he gave testimony on the subject which shows the way in which he regards it; and doubtless the way in which the Army, or those of them who have authorized and required this thing, regard it. They do not say what the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] intimates by his inquiries, that these were legitimate acts within the range of recognized rules of civilized warfare. They do not say so.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. SPOONER. Is guerrilla warfare civilized warfare?

Mr. BACON. Yes; within certain limits.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BACON. Yes.

Mr. FORAKER. Are murder and assassination, as recited in these orders, civilized warfare?

Mr. SPOONER. "Within certain limits."

Mr. BACON. No; I do not say so. I am not to be diverted by such inquiries from the point I am on.

Mr. FORAKER. But do not these orders recite that murders and assassinations have been committed? Are they not mentioned in the orders?

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I am not to be diverted by Senators. I will state again the proposition I was about to state. I say that the class of warfare which the Senators by their inquiries indicate as being civilized warfare in their opinion, is warfare that the officers in the Philippine Islands themselves say is not civilized warfare. We are talking about the fact that it is not civilized warfare, and when the fact is admitted that it is not civilized warfare the question is answered.

Mr. SPOONER. Did they not say that it was because they were not carrying on a war——

Mr. BACON. I have not yet read what I want to read.

Mr. SPOONER. Did they not say it was because the war against which they were contending is not civilized warfare?

Mr. BACON. They said it was not civilized warfare because the people were not civilized, or rather they abandoned civilized warfare because the people were not civilized, thereby implying that they were not entitled to have the rules of civilized warfare applied to them.

Mr. President, yesterday I read this language, but now, in order that it may be in connection with what I am going to read from General Hughes, to show how it was that these officers came to the conclusion that these people were not to be dealt with as civilized people, and the rules of civilized warfare were not to be observed, I will read it again. I read yesterday from the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] an exhibit, which is an extract from the report of General Bell, which is found in Part 3 of the Report of the Lieutenant-General Commanding the Army, 1901, pages 34 and 35, in which General Bell uses this language in his report:

> I have been in Indian campaigns where it took over 100 soldiers to capture each Indian, but the problem here is more difficult on account of the inbred treachery of these people, their great number, and the impossibility of recognizing the actively bad from the only passively so. If it was deemed advisable to pursue the methods of European nations and armies in suppressing rebellions among the Asiatics, the insurrection could have been easily put down months ago. Even now, although the seeds of rebellion have permeated all classes, such methods would soon put an end to all active insurrection.

That implies what I will show directly from the testimony of General Hughes, that up to that time the rules of civilized warfare had been observed, and that it was suggested that if they could abandon the rules of civilized warfare and adopt the rules European nations had adopted in dealing with Asiatic peoples, the perpetration of these horrible barbarities, these wholesale slaughters and burnings of property—if they could adopt such methods, then the insurrection could be put down. If it did not mean that it meant nothing; if it did not mean that there should be an abandonment of the rules of civilized warfare and the adoption of the harsh and cruel measures which were condemned by civilized warfare, what did it mean?

Mr. President, what is General Hughes's testimony on that line?

It is found on page 558 of the hearings before the Philippine Committee. The Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] asked this question:

In this connection, in burning towns, what would you do? Would the entire town be destroyed by fire or would only offending portions of the town be burned?

General HUGHES. I do not know that we ever had a case of burning what you would call a town in this country, but probably a barrio or a sitio; probably a half a dozen houses, native shacks, where the insurrectos would go in and be concealed, and if they caught a detachment passing they would kill some of them.

Senator RAWLINS. What did I understand you to say would be the consequences of that?

General HUGHES. They usually burned the village.

Senator RAWLINS. All of the houses in the village?

General HUGHES. Yes; every one of them.

Senator RAWLINS. What would become of the inhabitants?

General HUGHES. That was their lookout.

Then continuing the examination:

Senator RAWLINS. If these shacks were of no consequence, what was the utility of their destruction?

General HUGHES. The destruction was as a punishment.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator give me the page?

Mr. BACON. Page 558. I had already announced it.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not hear it.

Mr. BACON. It continues:

General HUGHES. The destruction was as a punishment. They permitted these people to come in there and conceal themselves, and they gave no sign. It is always——

Senator RAWLINS. The punishment in that case would fall not upon the men, who could go elsewhere, but mainly upon the women and little children.

General HUGHES. The women and children are part of the family, and where you wish to inflict a punishment you can punish the man probably worse in that way than in any other.

Senator RAWLINS. But is that within the ordinary rules of civilized warfare? Of course, you could exterminate the family, which would be still worse punishment.

General HUGHES. These people are not civilized.

Senator RAWLINS. Then I understand you to say it is not civilized warfare?

General HUGHES. No; I think it is not.

Senator RAWLINS. You think it is not?

Senator DIETRICH. In order to carry on civilized warfare both sides have to engage in such warfare.

General HUGHES. Yes, sir; certainly. That is the point.

I think, if I am allowed to go on, I will come to a place where I shall have something to say that will bear directly on this subject.

CONDUCT OF THE WAR BECOMES STERNER.

Senator HALE. You made a very interesting statement some time ago that from year to year, or from summer to summer, the conduct of the war was sterner, stiffer, as you called it. You are describing what took place the second summer, not the first?

General HUGHES. Yes.

Mr. President, what words are strong enough to condemn the utterance by an American general that women and children are burned out of house and home as a punishment on the husbands and fathers, because by the suffering inflicted on the women and children the worst punishment is inflicted on the husbands and fathers. I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to what I am about to read, in connection with the statement I made yesterday as to the change in the methods in the progress of the war.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator from Ohio will let me read this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia declines to yield at present.

Mr. FORAKER. I think the Senator would not decline if he knew what I wished to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BACON. I think I ought to be allowed to finish reading this.

Mr. FORAKER. I merely wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that I made that statement myself before he did. Last Monday I called attention to the fact that after the war had been prosecuted for two years in the most humane way, with the great success that had attended it in these four provinces where was this bitter resistance, it became necessary to resort to the measures which the Senator was criticising.

Mr. BACON. Very well; the Senator agrees to that. The Senator read the statement of Professor Schurman, and the statement was not qualified, and it would leave the impression that it applied to the entire course of the Army during the war, and in response I made the statement that it was doubtless true of the first year of the war, but that it had changed very materially thereafter.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FORAKER. Immediately following——

Mr. BACON. I want to read this. I do not think I am unreasonable in the matter of submitting to interruptions, but Senators should not make it utterly impossible for me to proceed with any continuous argument. It seems to me I am not unreasonable in requesting that unless there is a necessity to ask questions I be allowed to proceed with some degree of continuity.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Georgia to decline to yield?

Mr. BACON. No, I do not decline to yield, but I was right in the midst of the reading.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator yields, I understand. The Senator will agree that I have not unnecessarily interrupted him. In fact, I have interrupted him very little. I only interrupted him when he appealed to me and commented upon some remarks I had made.

I interrupted him a moment ago simply to call his attention to the fact that I myself recognized that there had been a change, so far as the prosecution of the war in these particular provinces was concerned, and now the Senator calls attention to the fact that I read the report of Dr. Schurman, as though I left it there without any comment to indicate that there had been a change afterwards. The Senator will find, if he will consult my remarks as they appear in the RECORD, that I then called attention to the fact that following that was this change, the same about which he speaks in these particular provinces, and for the reasons set forth in the order which I then read, and I read the orders and called attention to the reasons therein assigned to show why there had been a change in Batangas, Laguna, Samar, and Leyte.

Mr. BACON. I will now resume the reading.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I want to tell the Senator why I took the liberty of interrupting him.

Mr. BACON. The Senator need not make any explanation or apology.

Mr. SPOONER. It is apologetic, in a way. It was because I do not know any man who is less disconcerted by an interruption than the Senator, nor anyone better able always to take care of an interruption than the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. If I had thought for a moment that it was distasteful, I would not have done so.

Mr. BACON. It is not. But it is a fact that yesterday, while I was upon the floor a very long time, almost half of the time was occupied by other Senators, not the Senator from Wisconsin, because he did not interrupt me. It is true that I have been on the floor an hour to-day, and I have not been able to make five minutes consecutive talk in that time. There will be a long ways, when anybody comes to read the RECORD, between two lines of what I was reading. I will read over the question of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], because the answer to it was interrupted right in the middle.

Senator HALE. You made a very interesting statement some time ago that from year to year, or from summer to summer, the conduct of the war was sterner—stiffer, as you called it. You are describing what took place the second summer, not the first?

General HUGHES. Yes.

In the first campaign the rules of civilized warfare were rigidly enforced. The fact is there was a building burned the first two or three days I was out, and I issued an order that any man caught setting fire to a building should be promptly arrested, and if he ran and could not be stopped in any other way, shoot him. I could not tell whether these fires were started by some of our own men or by Chinamen with our command, who were there for the purpose of transporting the wounded and the sick, etc., but anyway in nearly every encampment up to that time there was some little fire somewhere. That stopped it—

That is, the order to shoot the people who did the burning—and from that time on I do not think there were any fires or anything of that kind, and there was none, so far as I can recall, in that year's operations. But the next year we found it necessary to adopt more stringent methods in order to reach these people.

What does that mean? It means that General Hughes says they observed the rules of legitimate warfare in the first year; that he does not think the burning of houses is within the rules of civilized warfare, and he departed from those rules thereafter, and that from that time on until the present they have been pursuing warfare which is not civilized warfare, in the burning of the cities and towns and the houses of people.

But the Senators by their questions would seem to indicate that they thought that that which is now being testified to as being done is within the rules of civilized warfare. There is no doubt about the fact of the particular acts being done, because the testimony shows it, and if they are not within the rules of civilized warfare and Senators approve and defend them, then the only thing to be said is that they approve this policy of pursuing warfare in a manner which is not civilized and which is in violation of the rules of civilized warfare.

If Senators are ready to take that position before the American people, we know where they stand. One of two things must necessarily be true. If, as General Hughes says, and as the testimony proves beyond possibility of successful contradiction, cities and towns and houses are burned in violation of the rules of civilized warfare, either those actions are to be condemned or to be approved. If Senators who take issue with us who condemn them approve them, then there is no issue between us as to anything but the question of right and wrong in such burnings. There is no question of fact.

I wish to read a little more from what General Hughes says:

Senator RAWLINS. Is it not true that operations in the islands became progressively more severe within the past year and a half in dealing with districts which were disturbed?

General HUGHES. I think that is true. I would not say it is entirely so. The severities depend upon the man immediately in command of the force that he has with him. In the department I suppose I had at times as many as a hundred and twenty commands in the field. Each commander, under general restrictions, had authority to act for himself.

In other words, he had authority to burn or not to burn as he might see proper, in his own judgment, and, consequently, as some thought proper to burn a little more freely than others, the rule and practice, according to what he said, varied. He goes on to say:

These commanders were changed from time to time. The new commanders coming in would probably start in very much easier than the old ones.

In other words, they would not burn the cities and towns and houses quite as much as the old ones. They had not got to be so callous. They had not got to be so absolutely indifferent to all rules of civilized warfare, and consequently they were easier, as General Hughes says:

These commanders were changed from time to time. The new commanders coming in would probably start in very much easier than the old ones.

Senator HALE. Very much what?

General HUGHES. Easier. They would come from this country with their ideas of civilized warfare, and they were allowed to get their lesson.

Mr. HOAR. From whom does the Senator read?

Mr. BACON. From General Hughes. General Hughes says that these proceedings were not in accordance with civilized warfare. He says they abandoned the rules of civilized warfare after the first year. He says that with the vast number of commands under him he gave to each man a discretion to do as he pleased; that while they were started easy as time progressed they became more callous, and they burned more freely. Then when new men came there they brought with them ideas of civilized warfare, and they were permitted to progress and get their lesson, although as time progressed they, too, would abandon all civilized warfare and burn and destroy, without regard to the rules of civilized warfare.

Now, let me read what one of the witnesses said about that. There was before the committee a witness by the name of Grover Flint, whose testimony is found on page 1765, and on page 1784 there is this testimony:

Q. In that connection I will ask you to state if you saw any Filipino towns burned by American soldiers.

A. Yes; I have seen hamlets, small towns of 50 or 60 houses, burned.

Q. How many houses?

A. Fifty or sixty houses; what they call barrios.

Q. Were the people who lived in these houses engaged in peaceable pursuits?

A. Apparently; yes.

Q. And they were burned by the American troops?

A. They were.

Q. By whose orders?

A. I don't know; I never happened to be in command of the column that went out to burn.

Q. Did you know of the burning of your own knowledge?

A. Absolutely.

Q. You saw it?

A. I saw it.

Q. By American soldiers?

A. Yes; I saw it.

Senator PATTERSON. What became of the men, women, and children that were occupying those hamlets?

The WITNESS. I think the idea was at that time that the burning of these villages would drive the people to the woods or to the towns; a policy of concentration, I think.

This witness is from Massachusetts, a commissioned officer, a man of education, position, and character.

That is the Sunday-school performance, that is the act of humanity, that is the process of kindliness and mercy that the Senator from Ohio spoke about yesterday, when it was not for the purpose of inflicting punishment or cruelty upon the people outside of the zone of life, but was for the purpose of kindly taking them in out from danger. It occurs to me that if it was a religious proceeding at all, it must have been for the purpose of having these people have some little realization of what would come to them hereafter if they were not good in this life—to see what fire was.

Mr. President, I said—and I was diverted by the inquiry which has led me off on this line—that the Senator from Ohio had stated substantially that he regarded the order of Bell as an order in harmony with the rules of civilized warfare, and I stated that the Senator from Massachusetts did not agree with him, and I was about to read the remark of the Senator from Massachusetts with regard to that matter. On the 29th of April the Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] asked the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] this question:

I should like to ask the Senator if he indorses that order of General Bell, issued on the 8th day of December, 1901? It is a question, Mr. President, to which I desire an answer from the Senator from Massachusetts if he is disposed to give one.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator ask if I indorse the order of General Bell?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. No, sir; I do not indorse cruel methods of waging warfare.

So the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Ohio do not agree, and I repeat that two weeks ago there was no Senator to be found in this Chamber who would defend the acts which they now defend boldly before the American people. It has gotten to a point where they either have to defend them as proper acts or condemn those who perpetrated them.

Mr. President, I regret very much that I have consumed so much time on this particular part of the matter, because I intended simply to allude to it and to pass to some other things which I wish to say; but before passing to them I desire to repeat that the great purpose which I had is that there may be a lesson pointed to the American people, that they may see what is the necessary, unavoidable result to flow from the effort which is being made to dominate an inferior race and to control them against their will, and that the history of all nations shows that that effort is always attended by cruelties and barbarities such as would not be recognized in warfare between people of equal rank in the civilized world.

Mr. President, this matter was pointed out when this policy was first entered upon. When the question was up as to the acquisition of the Philippine Islands, predictions were made that there would be this lamentable consequence flow from the effort of the American people to dominate the Philippine Islands and to subject them to our sway. Speeches were made both in the House of Representatives and in the Senate in which that was predicted, and our people were warned that such would be the case. In a speech which I made in the Senate on the 18th day of January, 1899, before the ratification of the treaty of peace, I had something to say on that subject, which I will now read not for the purpose of showing that I said it, but because it is applicable now to the question whether the people of America will continue in this course or whether they will change. In that speech I read from a book which was written by Mr. John Russell Young, entitled "Around the World with General Grant," and in it I said this:

It is a brief account of the treatment of one regiment of Sepoys, not all of them; a regiment which had been disarmed; a regiment which had tried to make its escape; a regiment which, it is true, had murdered some of its officers. Now I am going to read the account of this as given by Mr. Young in the second volume of that work, on page 93:

"The Twenty-sixth Native Infantry"—

Speaking of the Indian infantry—

"The Twenty-sixth Native Infantry had been disarmed in May and kept under guard. On July 30 some madman in the regiment killed the major. The author of this murder was a favorite named Prakash Pandy, who rushed out of his hut, called upon his comrades to rise, and, seeing the major, killed him. The sergeant-major was also slain. The Twenty-sixth had served with distinction in many campaigns, notably in the Afghan campaign of 1842. It was thought that the fugitives would run south to Delhi to join the king.

"But they took a northern direction, away from the war, anxious to reach Cashmere, to be out of India. They had no guns. There was a drenching rain, and the country was almost flooded. The troops came up with them, shooting 150 and driving them into the river, drowned inevitably, 'too weakened and famished, as they must have been after their 40 miles' flight, to battle with the flood.' The main body escaped, swimming and floating to an island, 'where they might be descried crouching like a brood of wild fowl.' Mr. Cooper started out to capture them."

After stating the fact of the capture, it goes on:

"The doomed men, with joined palms, the Hindoo attitude of entreaty, crowded into the boats and were brought on shore. 'In utter despair forty or fifty dashed into the stream and disappeared.' No order was given to fire, and the fugitives, says Mr. Cooper in a spirit of playfulness, became possessed of a 'sudden and insane idea that they were going to be tried by a court-martial after some luxurious refreshment.'"

So they were brought on shore, one by one, tightly bound, their decorations and necklaces ignominiously cut off. "Some begged that their women and children might be spared, and were informed that the British Government did not condescend to war with women and children." They were marched to the town, "the gracious moon," Mr. Cooper informing us, coming out through the clouds, and reflecting herself in myriad pools and streams to "light the prisoners to their fate."

They arrived at midnight. Next morning at daybreak Mr. Cooper took his seat. He had 282 prisoners, besides numbers of camp followers. He sent his Mohammedan troops, fearing they might hesitate to shoot Mohammedans, to a religious festival, and, alone with his "faithful Sikhs," proceeded to do justice. "Ten by ten," says Mr. Cooper, "the Sepoys were called forth. Their names having been taken down in succession, they were pinioned, linked together, and marched to execution, a firing party being in readiness."

And so it goes on and describes how that entire regiment—and I will not stop to read it now, because the hour is getting late and it is too long—were shot without trial, some of them blown from the mouths of cannon. That is only one of a great many instances of the same kind which could be cited. In commenting on that I said this:

Mr. President, I do not read that for the purpose of casting any reflection upon the English people. On the contrary, I recognize them as the most Christian and the most humane nation of Europe. But only with the sword and gun can millions of the semicivilized be kept in subjection. The very best that can be said, and what is proper to be said, is that it was necessary that the English should perpetrate this cruelty, this butchery, if they would maintain their dominion in India, and that is the purpose for which I have read it.

And in commenting on this I added:

If we are to maintain dominion over this foreign, alien people, these Mohammedans, these people accustomed to revolution and to blood and to disorder, if you please, we will be compelled to do it with iron hand, regardless of the shedding of blood.

I went on to speak——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does not the Senator from Georgia think that, on the whole, the British occupation of India has been a benefit to that country?

Mr. BACON. I am not now going to discuss that question. I am not prepared to discuss it, and if I were I certainly would not take the time to discuss it now. There have been expressions in my hearing to the effect that it has not been, but I am not going to discuss it. It is certainly not in the line of the speech I am endeavoring to make.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. I want to say very positively that that is my opinion, and I think it is an opinion that can be justified.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. I hope the discussion will not run on. It certainly is not just to me that it should.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I merely wish to say that while I am always delighted to have the opinion of the Senator from Tennessee, I asked for the opinion of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. I am not going to give my opinion——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. All right.

Mr. BACON. Because it is not pertinent to the point I am discussing; but I do say that the Senator may conceive it to be as beneficial to the Hindoos in their material interests as he pleases, or that it is as beneficial as the Senator may conceive it to be to the English people, but that nothing will compensate in that regard for the cruelties and the inhumanities that have in the past been heaped upon the people of India in order that British rule might be maintained.

And so, sir, I say, with reference to the Philippine Islands, that our retention of sovereignty there, the keeping of those people in subjection against their will, has not only been attended by brutalities in the past, but it will be attended by brutalities in the future, ever recurring; and it is for the purpose of pointing that lesson, for the purpose, if possible, of attracting the attention of the American people to what is before us in that regard, that I dwell upon the question of these atrocities.

Mr. President, is there anybody in the United States with a heart within his bosom and any regard for the good name of the United States who rejoices at the present situation? While Senators may defend what has been done, is there a Senator who would not rejoice if it had not been done? When we think of all that has occurred; when we think of the soldiers from this country who have died there, and of those who have been killed there, and the homes in this country which have been desolated on that account; when we think of the tens of thousands of Filipinos who have been slaughtered; when we think of the hundreds of thousands of Filipinos who have died in consequence of the war; when we think of the numbers of soldiers who have or are to come back ruined in health; when we think of the strain that has been put upon our institutions—the wrench, if you please, of our Constitution—in order to adapt our situation to this new colonial policy, how many of the American people—viewing not only that, but looking forward to the dreary future which is before us in this connection, the blush that is to come hereafter, the hundreds of millions of dollars that have already been spent, and the vast treasure which must be spent—how many, what proportion of the American people, are glad we are in the Philippine Islands?

How many Senators are there who in their hearts would not be glad if there were a way in which we could, in their opinion, be honorably quit of them? Mr. President, when you present to them the great sacrifices that we have made, when you talk to them about the great injury to the free institutions of this country, when you talk to them about the horrible task that is before us, how many are there who say they can not dispute that, and add, "We are there, and what are we to do about it?" As if a great evil, a great misfortune, is to be recognized and admitted, and yet we are to sit supinely, as if we had not the wit or the wisdom to move hand or foot in the effort to rescue ourselves from the evil.

Mr. President, what is to be done about it? Whenever we ask the question what is to be done, or whenever we propose to do anything, we are met by two stereotyped answers. Senators will not discuss the question as to practical methods of procedure. They will not endeavor to agree with you upon any plan by which this unfortunate situation may be relieved. And there are but two replies. One is that it is an inglorious retreat which is proposed. Whenever you speak about any solution of this matter which shall have for its ultimate purpose the design to rid this country of the incubus, if I may so call it, to rid us of this great burden, the reply is that we are there and that to leave there is to ingloriously retreat and leave the islands to anarchy.

Not only that, but Senators endeavor to use opprobrious terms, and the favorite one is "scuttle." They say to those who advocate such a disposition as will in any way relieve the United States of this connection that we propose the game of scuttle, and that it is an inglorious abandonment of an enterprise undertaken.

The other answer is that it is proposed to ingloriously withdraw the army before it has established the authority of the United States and put down armed opposition to it. Now, sir, I wish to say that there has been no proposition to do either of these things, and there is no such proposition now. Every proposition is based on the establishment of peace and order and of the authority of the United States as a prerequisite to our action.

I will ask Senators to state when they come to discuss this question whether or not it is an inglorious retreat or whether it is scuttle to do that which was proposed to be done in the beginning. I assert that the leading Senators on this floor in the beginning proposed to do exactly the thing that we have proposed to do ever since, which was not to retain the islands, but to take them temporarily and thereafter to establish free government for that people and to leave them alone. If that is true, then for us now to do that is no inglorious retreat, it is no abandonment.

There have been certain things said by Senators here which have been read very frequently in the Senate, and I read them again, not for the purpose of calling attention to any inconsistency on the part of Senators between their utterances of that day and their positions now, but to establish the proposition which I make, that Senators in the beginning announced the purpose to do what we now ask them to do, and that what they denominate now as "scuttle," as opprobrious, is exactly what they said in the beginning they intended should be done.

When I read speeches of that kind I am generally called on to read some from the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], because he has been about as emphatic on that subject as any man could be. I hope the Senate will bear in mind the purpose for which I read these extracts, and the application which I ask shall be made of them. The purpose which I have is to show that the very thing which we ask to be done is the thing which they said in the beginning should be done, and if there has been any change it has been in them and not in ourselves.

In the speech by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] on the 2d day of February, 1899, which was published by him in pamphlet form, on page 31, the Senator used the following language:

> But, Mr. President, I shrink from the notion that the interests of this country will be subserved by making permanently a part of our land territory thousands of miles away, inhabited by peoples alien to us, not of our blood, not of our way of thinking, foreign to all our associations, living in a tropical climate, where the white man can not work, under labor conditions of necessity which we would not permit to exist in the United States.
> Every argument which has been made in support of this doctrine of territorial expansion—and by "territorial expansion" I mean permanent territorial expansion—seems to me to be superficial, some of them sentimental, and some of them fantastic.

I have to skip along, because otherwise as it is all of it very much on the line, I would read the entire speech, but I have not time to do that and I only select certain parts. Speaking of the flag and the pulling down of the flag, the Senator said:

> To-day it floats in Cuba; the Spanish flag has gone forever, but our flag is not there to stay. It floats there in sight of the poor, wrecked Maine at Habana, but there will come a day, Mr. President—and I hope it will not be long—when we will take down our flag, raised there in the cause of liberty, and leave behind it liberty and an independent government, won and established under its folds.

I only read that for the connection of the next sentence:

> I hope that, too, about the Philippines, and that is not at all inconsistent in my view with the ratification of the pending treaty.

Again, in the same speech, the Senator said:

> I can not say, in view of the history of the country, that time may not change my views, but I must say that, as I now feel, if the ratification of this treaty involved permanent dominion by the United States over the archipelago and its people as a Territory of the United States, irrevocably committed us to the policy of territorial expansion, I could not give it my vote.

I hope the Senator will, unless he recollects this very well, give me his attention, because I want to recall it to him.

Mr. SPOONER. I recollect it perfectly.

Mr. BACON. Then I am reading it for the benefit of others. I am delighted to know that the Senator recollects it, because if he does he must admit the application I am going to make of it.

Mr. SPOONER. I will wait until I hear your application.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Wisconsin further said:

> Again, Mr. President, the whole matter will be within our own hands. If we find we can not get on with the Filipinos; if, after studying the conditions over there, our people find we can not without strife and intolerable burdens do them any good, we can then cede the sovereignty to them and sail away. We will not then be running away from a responsibility at first sight. We will not subject ourselves to possibly the just charge of cowardice by other nations. We will have left them then, after having made every honest effort in our power, upon the solid foundation of Spain's sovereignty and title, to help them to benefits which they would not have. We will have attempted to shower upon them blessings which long-continued tyranny has deprived them of the power to appreciate.

Mr. President, I commend to all who may feel an interest in the subject the entire speech of the Senator, much of which is on that line.

Now, for the application which I make of it, and I am going to make the application not only as to the Senator from Wisconsin, but to a half a dozen others whose utterances to the same effect I am going to read. The charge is that to leave the Philippine Islands is an abandonment of the purpose for which we went there; that it is what is commonly and opprobriously denominated scuttle; in other words, backing out.

That speech was made before the ratification of the treaty of peace, and it was made in advocacy of the ratification. I say that before the ratification in that speech the Senator from Wisconsin committed himself to the proposition plainly that so far as he was concerned the purpose was not the permanent retention of the islands, and that so far as he was concerned if that were the purpose he would not vote for it, and he recognized that it would be a legitimate act after we had ratified it to establish a government there for the benefit of the people and leave them there. It does not lie in his mouth to say that it is "scuttle," that it is backing out, that it is an abandonment of the original purpose, when the minority now advocates the course which the majority then said would be pursued. That is the application which I make of it and which I think is an absolutely legitimate one.

But the Senator was not alone in that statement. As I said, the speech from which I have quoted abounds in repetition in one way or another of that same thought. It was only because of the fact that those statements were made by Senators that the ratification of that treaty was secured, and there are Senators now members of this body who have stated, and will continue to state, that in the absence of those assurances that it would be considered a proper thing to leave the Philippine Islands they would never have voted for the ratification of the treaty, and without their votes it could not have been ratified.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] used language which I shall also read. I want to say that the Senator from Wisconsin, if I do not err, has in this Congress, certainly if not in this in the last, affirmed that he still approved of everything he then stated. If so, upon what possible grounds can the Senator assume that those who now propose to do what he then said he would favor and which he would approve are guilty of a base abandonment of a purpose to the contrary.

The Senator from Ohio used this language on that subject in the same debate:

I do not understand anybody to be proposing to take the Philippine Islands with the idea and view of permanently holding them and denying to the people there the right to have a government of their own, if they are capable of it and want to establish it. I do not understand that anybody wants to do that. I have not heard of anybody who wants to do that. The President of the United States does not, I know, and no Senator in this Chamber has made any such statement.

Now, Mr. President, there is a statement from the Senator from Ohio to the same effect.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. FORAKER. I submit that if the Senator gives a part of a statement of that character he ought to give all of it. What the Senator has quoted from a speech I made on the occasion referred to is only a part of what was said by me at that time. I was interrogated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and others, and in connection with that, as a part of the same colloquy, occurs what, if the Senator will allow me, I should like to insert here. I think it is only fair that it should be so inserted.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will insert it without reading, I have no objection.

Mr. FORAKER. It will take but a minute.

Mr. BACON. I think I ought to be allowed to proceed.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not think it is unreasonable, inasmuch as the Senator did not quote all of it, that I should insist upon its being inserted here.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

Mr. FORAKER. I then said:

I think when we come to consider the question of policy with respect to the Philippines, the conditions there existing, their feeling of friendship, or their feeling of consent or of objection will have much to do with determining Congress in that respect. I say I do not know of anybody, from the President of the United States down to his humblest follower in this matter, who is proposing by force and violence to take and hold those islands for all time to come. That is all I can say in answer to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not think that changes the proposition. I will not reread it. It will be in juxtaposition, and people can judge for themselves.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] used the following language in that debate:

Suppose we ratify the treaty. The islands pass from the possession of Spain into our possession without committing us to any policy. I believe we shall have the wisdom not to attempt to incorporate those islands with our body politic or make their inhabitants a part of our citizenship. I believe we shall have the wisdom, the self-restraint, and the ability to restore peace and order in those islands and give their people the opportunity for self-government and for freedom under the protecting shield of the United States until the time shall come when they shall stand alone.

Mr. President, that is all we are asking now. If Congress will simply announce that it is the purpose to let these people stand alone, and that it is the purpose to proceed in a safe and leisurely manner, if you please, to accomplish that end, but that the ultimate end is to cut off from us this excrescence of colonialism and to give freedom to that people, we will not quarrel with them as to the time within which it shall be done or the particular methods. What we object to is a policy which adheres to colonialism, which refuses to say that it is not the purpose to maintain it as the permanent policy of this Government, and which step by step, in the absence of a declared policy, has a tendency to fasten it upon the country with more and more indissoluble bonds.

But that is not the point I am now after. The point I am after is that these Senators at the time announced that they did not consider that the permanent retention of the islands was the policy, and that therefore the proposition now not to hold them is not entitled to the condemnation of being scuttle or any other improper abandonment.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] also said:

I want no subject races and no vassal States. That we had by the fortunes of war assumed a great responsibility in the Philippines; that we ought to give to those people an opportunity for freedom, for peace, and for self-government.

I want to get this country out of war and back to peace. I want to get the disposition and control of the Philippines out of the hands of the war power and place them where they belong—in the hands of Congress and the President. I want to enter into a policy that shall enable us to give peace and self-government to the natives of those islands.

Both by the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Massachusetts, as well as by the Senator from Wisconsin, there is a distinct declaration that the ratification of that treaty and the acquisition of those islands were not, in their opinion, acts which committed us to the permanent retention of the islands. That being so, the proposition in a proper way to be rid of the islands is not an abandonment of the original purpose.

Now, Mr. President, there are similar extracts which I have here from the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], who has been consistent from the beginning and who is consistent now:

There are few people in the world incapable of self-government. I believe the people of Luzon are capable of self-government now. I believe the people of some of the islands are? I do not know but all are. Mr. President, I keep in view this truth which I have stated, which I believe to be a truth, that the people are entitled to a government of their own making, and that we have no right to say, "Your standard is so low you will create a government which we can not affirm; therefore you can not have a government of your own." They are entitled to only such a government as they themselves can maintain; it must be one producing order and protection to persons and property, for otherwise it is not a government at all.

He continued:

We shall make a mistake if we make up our minds that we are going to govern these people from here, that we are going to govern them with Anglo-Saxons whom we send out there from here to administer the affairs of that country. You will need 50,000 soldiers; in a little while you will need more, for they are a great people. They are a people who are willing to contend for their liberty, and I believe it also to be an axiom that a people who will fight for their liberty and who are willing to die for it are capable of maintaining it.

I also read one from the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], as follows:

I am not in favor of annexation, not because I would apprehend any particular trouble from it, but because it is not a wise policy to take in any people of foreign tongue and training and without strong guiding American elements.

Also one from Mr. Thurston, then a Senator from Nebraska, as follows:

I am unalterably opposed to any departure from the declared policy of the fathers, which would start this Republic, for the first time, upon a career of conquest and dominion utterly at variance with the avowed purpose and manifest destiny of our republican Government.

And one from the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. MCLAURIN], as follows:

It is idle to speak of Americanizing a tropical country 8,000 miles away. Our people will never consent for the people of that far-off land to ever have a voice in the affairs of our country. Therefore, to govern them we must inaugurate a military or colonial system utterly at variance with the principles of our Republic. But even if by a strained construction of the Constitution the power is vested in the United States to inaugurate a colonial system, I am utterly opposed, as a matter of policy, to the acquisition of any territory that can not be Americanized and brought into harmony with our institutions. I believe the time is not far off, and I gladly welcome its approach, when our flag will float over every foot of North American soil, but it must come naturally and peacefully—by the consent of the governed, not by the rude hand of war.

But when it comes to thrusting our rule upon 10,000,000 people on another continent by force of arms, I hold that such a policy is unwise as well as at variance with the principles upon which our Government is founded. Taxation without representation is as much tyranny as when King George's tea was dumped into Boston Harbor. To govern the people of the Philippines without their consent is as much government without the consent of the governed as it was when we were under the rule of Great Britain.

In a commercial point of view, I believe the importance of the Philippines per se is greatly exaggerated. They are chiefly valuable as the key to the Orient, but we need not colonize to obtain that advantage. The exports of the Philippines, according to the statistical abstract, in 1896 amounted to $30,806,250. If this entire trade was monopolized by us it would be insignificant. We will have to teach them to wear shirts and breeches before we can trade with them much.

And one from Mr. Gray, of Delaware, as follows:

Now we have them, it does not follow that we are committed to a colonial policy or to a violation of those great principles of liberty and self-government which must always remain American ideals if our own free institutions are to endure. No country, and this country least of all, can afford to trample on its ideals. I have no fear that it will do so.

He went further:

I assure you, with some knowledge of whereof I speak, that the President is committed to no policy calculated to discourage, much less strike down, the aspirations of liberty-loving people all over the world.

Mr. President, in this connection the point to which I wish to call the attention of Senators is that there is no set of resolutions that has ever been introduced into the Senate by anyone who was opposed to the imperialistic policy which ever proposed that we should leave those islands without ceremony, without regard to the question whether there was a government there which could protect the people from any disorder. Every set of resolutions which has ever been presented, whether by a committee or by an individual Senator, has declared as the basis of the proposition that there should first be erected in those islands a stable government.

The purpose thus declared by Senators in the extracts from their speeches is the purpose which the opponents of the present bill now seek to accomplish. Not only so, but every effort which has been made by the minority in opposition to an enforced colonial policy has been consistent with the purpose thus declared by those Senators and by others. There has never been any effort or purpose to make a dishonorable or inglorious retreat from the islands. There has never been any purpose that our Government should leave those islands until order was restored and a stable government was established in them. There has never been a purpose that the flag of the United States should be taken down until it was taken down voluntarily and in honor, just as it has been taken down voluntarily and in honor in Cuba.

What is proposed by the minority is to aid the Filipinos in establishing a free government for themselves, just as we have done in Cuba, and one of the principal objections to the pending bill is that it takes no step in that direction.

We have sent two commissions to govern the islands. Both of these commissions have been composed of men of distinguished ability. Each of these commissions, after great labor in investigating conditions, has recommended that the Filipinos be authorized to participate through representative bodies in the control of their own central government.

Admiral Dewey, in a letter to the Secretary of the Navy, June 27, 1898, said the Filipinos were far superior to the Cubans. This letter is found in the report of the Secretary of the Navy for 1898, vol. 2, page 103. August 29 he wrote the Secretary of the Navy that further intercourse with them had confirmed him in that opinion. I have made a similar inquiry of numbers of officers who have served both in the Philippines and in Cuba, and their testimony is uniformly to the same effect.

We have adjudged the Cubans as capable of self-government. We have spent four years in preparing them for their task, and finally we have established them as an independent republic. Why should we deny this to the Filipinos? We have a right to the greatest pride and self-gratulation upon our disinterested and noble work in Cuba. Through all the ages it must redound to our honor and glory. And still greater will be the honor and the glory if we shall give a free government to the Philippines.

Mr. President, I want to say to the Senate that I had no expectation of consuming the time which I have this afternoon. I have not finished, but I want to say that I have not been permitted to pursue any connected and continuous line of argument, and the interruptions have been so constant that it has been impossible for me to continue the argument which I began on yesterday with any degree of satisfaction to myself or, I am sure, with any pleasure to those who attempted to listen to me. I am not saying this in the way of complaint against interruptions. I am simply stating the fact.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. If the Senator desires to suspend his remarks for the day, I think he should be permitted to do so. He has spoken long and vigorously. I would suggest, if it be agreeable to him, that he resume his remarks at a later date, and that the Senate now take up the public buildings bill, in which many are interested.

Mr. BACON. I should like to complete what I was just saying. I really feel that I owe an apology for the very lame and imperfect manner in which I have presented my views to the Senate. In the first place, as must be apparent to the Senate, I am laboring under considerable physical disability. I have spoken with very great effort, but still, if I had been permitted to pursue any continuous line of thought, I believe I might possibly have gotten through with some degree of satisfaction; but my remarks have been so broken up and so disjointed that that is to-day an utter impossibility.

I am anxious to present some matters to the Senate and will ask their indulgence to do so hereafter. I do not feel that I can this afternoon pursue the subject with any degree of satisfaction whatever.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 14018, known as the public-buildings bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 14018) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds with amendments.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that the bill be read for amendment, the amendments of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to be first considered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was, in section 1, on page 2, line 11, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty" and insert "five;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office and court-house at Fort Smith, Ark., from $130,607.96 to $205,607.96.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 14, before the word "hundred," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight;" so as to make the clause read:

United States mint at Denver, Colo., from $500,000 to $800,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 2, line 17, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty" and insert "ninety;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office and court-house at Beaumont, Tex., from $75,000 to $190,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to acquire additional ground adjoining the present site sufficient in size to accommodate the necessary enlargement of the present building, said additional ground to cost not exceeding $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "forty-six" and insert "sixty-six;" and in line 14, before the word "changes," to insert "extension and;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office at Burlington, Iowa, from $126,213.79 to $166,213.79, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to make the necessary extension and changes in said building within the limit of cost hereby fixed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty-nine" and insert "thirty-four;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office, court-house, and custom-house at Augusta, Me., from $209,176.06 to $334,176.06.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty-five" and insert "fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office and court-house at Joplin, Mo., from $100,000 to $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 12, before the word "thousand," to strike out "two hundred and seventy-five" and insert "three hundred and fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office and court-house at Butte, Mont., from $225,000 to $350,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 21, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifteen" and insert "ten;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office at New Brunswick, N. J., from $100,000 to $110,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 9, after the word "million," to insert "five hundred thousand;" so as to make the clause read:

United States custom-house at New York City, N. Y., from $3,000,000 to $4,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 11, before the word

"thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-five," and in line 12, after the word "Provided," to strike out:

That said building shall be erected upon the site in said city now owned by the Government of the United States.

And insert:

That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, in his discretion, to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a new site in said city, and to erect thereon the public building heretofore authorized, payment for said new site to be made from the appropriation heretofore made for said public building. That the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed, in the event of the acquisition of a new site, to sell at public or private sale, at such time and on such terms as he shall deem best, the land heretofore acquired in said city as a site for said public building, and to deposit the net proceeds of such sale in the Treasury of the United States, to be expended in the construction of said building.

So as to make the clause read:

United States post-office and court-house at Elizabeth City, N. C., from $100,000 to $125,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized, in his discretion, to acquire by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a new site in said city, and to erect thereon the public building heretofore authorized, payment for said new site to be made from the appropriation heretofore made for said public building. That the Secretary of the Treasury is further authorized and directed, in the event of the acquisition of a new site, to sell at public or private sale, at such time and on such terms as he shall deem best, the land heretofore acquired in said city as a site for said public building, and to deposit the net proceeds of such sale in the Treasury of the United States, to be expended in the construction of said building.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 6, before the word "hundred," to strike out "five" and insert "six;" and in line 8, after the word "cents," to insert:

For the purpose of enlarging said building so as to make the same suitable for the further accommodation of the post-office and United States courts which shall continue therein, and to provide for said courts an additional court room, jury room, judges' chambers, toilet accommodations, and other necessary conveniences.

So as to make the clause read:

United States post-office and court-house at Portland, Oreg., from $404,305.74 to $654,305.74, for the purpose of enlarging said building so as to make the same suitable for the further accommodation of the post-office and United States courts which shall continue therein, and to provide for said courts an additional court room, jury room, judges' chambers, toilet accommodations, and other necessary conveniences.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 23, before the word "hundred," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office, court-house, and custom-house at Memphis, Tenn., from $606,323.53 to $856,323.53.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three hundred and ninety-six" and insert "four hundred and forty-six;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office and court-house at Dallas, Tex., from $296,054.75 to $446,054.75.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 17, before the word "sixty," to insert "not less than;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office, court-house, and custom-house at St. Joseph, Mo., from $373,140.66 to $390,140.66: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury acquires by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise a tract of ground immediately adjoining the present site with a frontage of not less than 60 feet on Eighth street and a depth of 140 feet, within a limit of cost of $18,000, hereby fixed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 6, before the word "thousand," to strike out "fifty-seven" and insert "fifty-nine;" and in line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "six" and insert "eight;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office and court-house at Rome, Ga., from $51,104.48 to $59,104.48, and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized in his discretion to expend a sum not in excess of $8,000 for a tract of land immediately adjoining the post-office site in said city having a frontage of 88 feet on East First street and a depth of 182 feet.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 18, before the word "thousand," to strike out "four hundred and eighty-one" and insert "five hundred and thirty-one;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office and court-house at Springfield, Ill., from $381,864.22 to $531,864.22.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 24, before the word "thousand," to insert "and fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office, court-house, and custom-house at Seattle, Wash., from $750,000 to $950,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 24, to insert:

United States post-office and custom-house at Jacksonville, Fla., from $238,281.85 to $438,281.85.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 4, to insert:

United States post-office at Kalamazoo, Mich., from $72,119.54 to $132,119.54.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 2, to insert:

United States court-house, custom-house, and post-office at Omaha, Nebr., from $1,800,000 to $1,845,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 6, to insert:

United States court-house and post-office at Greensboro, N. C., from $58,457.49 to $133,457.49.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 14, after the word "dollars," to strike out ": Provided" and insert a period; so as to make the clause read:

United States post-office and court-house at Norfolk, Va., from $250,000 to $258,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 18, after the word "respectively," to strike out:

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 12, to strike out:

United States post-office at Sterling, Ill., $5,000.

Mr. CULLOM. I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to this amendment. The committee propose to strike out lines 13 and 14, providing an appropriation of $5,000 to buy a site at Sterling, Ill. I hope the Senator from Indiana will allow that provision to remain in the bill. It is a small sum, and Sterling is about as large as a good many of the towns wherein we are erecting buildings.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The subject will be considered in conference. The committee acted upon the matter.

Mr. CULLOM. If it were a new matter, I should not insist upon it; but inasmuch as it is in the bill as it came to us from the House, I hope the Senator will agree to allow it to remain.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I can not accept any modification.

Mr. CULLOM. I am inclined to insist that this item shall remain in the bill. I hope the Senator will not drive me to the necessity of having a vote upon it.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I hope the Senator will not drive the committee to the necessity of opposing the provision further. They gave consideration to the subject, and they did not think, in view of the demands of other places, particularly in the State of Illinois, that they could authorize an appropriation at the present time for the purchase of a site at Sterling.

Mr. CULLOM. Unless the Senator is willing to allow the proposition to be favorably considered in conference, if the House insists upon it, I should like to have a vote upon it. If the Senator will agree, with whatever pressure there may be on the part of the House for the retention of the item, to consider it fairly, I will allow the matter to pass by.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I will say to the Senator that the committee will be disposed to consider it fairly in conference.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was, on page 30, after line 14, to insert:

United States post-office at Champaign, Ill., $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 30, after line 16, to insert:

And jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the supreme court of the District of Columbia upon petition of said company to inquire into, hear, and determine the amount of all actual damage sustained by said company by reason of the provisions herein contained, and to enter judgment against the District of Columbia in such sum as may be so ascertained as aforesaid.

So as to read:

SEC. 6. That the Secretary of the Treasury and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, jointly, be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, for a sum not exceeding $550,000, for the joint use of the United States and the District of Columbia, for the erection thereon of a municipal building for said District, square 255 in the city of Washington, District of Columbia, and that portion of E street lying between said square and Pennsylvania avenue is hereby appropriated and made a part of said square for the purpose of erecting thereon the municipal building, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to change the route of the Washington, Alexandria, and Mount Vernon Electric Railway in such a manner as to cause said portion of E street to be vacated by the tracks of said company, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the supreme court of the District of Columbia upon petition of said company to inquire into, hear, and determine the amount of all actual damage sustained by said company by reason of the provisions herein contained, and to enter judgment against the District of Columbia in such sum as may be so ascertained as aforesaid, etc.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment. Beginning in line 16 I move to strike out all after the words "District of Columbia," down to and including the word "aforesaid" in line 5, page 32.

The SECRETARY. On page 31, it is proposed to strike out all after the word "Columbia" in line 16, down to and including the word "aforesaid" in line 5, page 32, as follows:

And that portion of E street lying between said square and Pennsylvania avenue is hereby appropriated and made a part of said square for the purpose of erecting thereon the municipal building, and the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized to change the route of the Washington, Alexandria, and Mount Vernon Electric Railway in such a manner as to cause said portion of E street to be vacated by the tracks of said company, and jurisdiction is hereby conferred upon the supreme court of the District of Columbia upon petition of said company to inquire into, hear, and determine the amount of all actual damage sustained by said company, by reason of the provisions herein contained, and to enter judgment against the District of Columbia in such sum as may be so ascertained as aforesaid.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Then in line 8, page 32, after the word "said," I move to strike out the words "square 255" and insert in lieu thereof the word "site."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair calls the attention of the Senator from Indiana to the same words found in line 16, on page 32.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. The same amendment to the amendment should be made.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed in line 16, page 32, to strike out the words "square 255" and to insert in lieu thereof the word "site."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 33, line 16, after the word "city," to strike out:

Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall not accept any bid or sum of money for said old custom-house building and site which does not furnish a sufficient sum of money to enlarge the United States post-office, court-house, and custom-house in said city so as to furnish suitable accommodations for all governmental offices in said city entitled to space in said building.

In line 22, after the word "Provided," to strike out "further," and in line 24, before the word "thousand," to strike out "three hundred" and insert "two hundred and sixty;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell the old custom-house building and the site thereof at the corner of Ninth and Walnut streets, in the city of Kansas City, Mo., at public or private sale, after proper advertisement, at such time and on such terms as he may deem to be to the best interests of the United States, and to execute a quitclaim deed to the purchaser thereof, and to apply the proceeds of the sale of said property, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to the completion of the post-office and court-house building in said city: Provided, That said building and site shall not be sold for a sum less than $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 34, line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "and fifty;" in line 10, before the word "thousand," to insert "and seventy-five;" in line 11, after the word "selected," to strike out "shall be an entire block or square of ground, with a street on each side thereof, consisting in" and insert "shall consist of an," and in line 14, before the word "thousand," to strike out "one hundred" and insert "seventy-five;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a site and to contract for the erection and completion thereon of a suitable building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, and approaches, complete, for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office in the city of St. Louis and State of Missouri, the cost of said site and building not to exceed $500,000, and the limit of cost of site is hereby fixed at $275,000: Provided, That the site selected shall consist of an area of not less than 75,000 square feet, and shall be located as near as possible to the Union Railway Station in said city.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the provision for a public building at Wheeling, W. Va., on page 36, line 21, after the word "fixed," to strike out the following proviso:

Provided, That the site selected shall consist of an entire block or square of ground bounded on each side by a street, and shall cost not to exceed the sum of $40,000, which sum is hereby fixed as the limit of cost of said site.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the same provision, on page 37, line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "sixty" and insert "twenty-five;" so as to make the clause read:

Provided, That said building and site shall not be sold for any sum less than $125,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, line 25, after the word "third," to strike out "street" and insert "and Mulberry streets;" on page 38, line 4, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy-two" and insert "one hundred and fifty-six;" in line 5, after the word "Provided" to strike out:

That the additional ground to be acquired on Third street shall have a frontage thereon of about 70 feet and a depth of about 118 feet and the limit of cost of said additional land shall not exceed the sum of $6,000.

And insert:

That the limit of cost of said additional land and site shall not exceed $31,000;

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 12. That "An act to provide for enlarging and improving the United States Government building at Macon, Ga., and to appropriate $58,000 therefor, approved March 2, 1899," is hereby amended so as to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to cause the post-office and court-house building at Macon, Ga., to be extended and enlarged so as to provide necessary accommodations for the post-office, courts, and other branches of the Government service, and to purchase additional ground on Third and Mulberry streets, in his discretion, for this purpose, and that the total cost of all said improvements, changes, and repairs, including the purchase price of an additional site, shall not exceed the sum of $156,000: Provided, That the limit of cost of said additional land and site shall not exceed $31,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 39, line 21, before the word "thousand," to strike out "seventy" and insert "eighty-two;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 14. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a suitable site in the city of Toledo and State of Ohio upon which to erect a building for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office and other governmental offices in said city: Provided, That the site selected shall consist of an entire block or square of ground, bounded on each side by a street, and shall consist in area of not less than 70,000 square feet, within a limit of cost of $125,000, hereby fixed: And provided further, That if the Secretary of the Treasury shall be unable to obtain a site as above described, then and in that case he is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a tract of land fronting on St. Clair street, immediately adjoining the present post-office site, having an area of 14,400 square feet, said tract of land being 120 feet square, within a limit of cost of $82,000, hereby fixed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 40, line 13, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "sixty-five;" and in line 17, before the word "thousand," to strike out "eighty" and insert "seventy;" so as to make the section read:

SEC. 15. That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, a suitable site in the city of Des Moines and State of Iowa upon which to erect a building for the use and accommodation of the United States post-office, court-house, custom-house, and other governmental offices in said city, and the limit of cost of site is hereby fixed at $165,000; Provided, That the site selected shall consist of an entire block or square of ground, bounded on each side by a street, and shall have an area of not less than 70,000 square feet. When the Secretary of the Treasury has acquired a site in said city, as herein provided, he shall make a report to Congress, stating the location, dimensions, and cost of the same, and recommend to Congress the character and size of building that should be erected upon said site, and submit an estimate of the cost of said building, including fireproof vaults, heating and ventilating apparatus, elevators, and approaches.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 41, line 15, before the word "of," to insert "all that portion;" in line 16, after the word "block," to insert "lying west of the alley;" in line 18, before the word "thousand," to strike out "and fifty;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

Or, in his discretion, to acquire a site elsewhere, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, and for this purpose may exchange the present site, should he deem such action advantageous, in full or part consideration for such new site.

On page 41, line 23, after the word "enlarged," to strike out "or upon the new site elsewhere acquired;" on page 42, line 4, after the word "cost," to strike out "including any amount expended for the enlargement of the present site or the purchase of a new site;" in line 7, after the word "thousand," to strike out "five hundred" and insert "seven hundred and fifty;" and in the same line, after the word "dollars," to strike out:

Such building, when completed, to be so located as to be unexposed to danger from fire in adjacent buildings by an open space of not less than 40 feet on all sides, including streets and alleys.

So as to read:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to enlarge the public building site belonging to the United States in the city of Los Angeles, Cal., by the acquisition, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, all that portion of the remainder of the block lying west of the alley in which said public-building site is located, provided the same can be acquired at not to exceed $100,000.

That upon the present site, when so enlarged, the Secretary is authorized and directed to cause to be erected a suitable and commodious fireproof building for the use and accommodation of the United States courts, post-office, and other Government offices in said city, at a total cost of not to exceed $750,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 42, after line 10, to strike out the following words:

That in the event of the purchase of a new site, if the present site is not exchanged in full or part consideration therefor, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to sell the present site at such time and upon such terms as in his judgment shall be to the best interests of the United States, and to deposit the proceeds of said sale in the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 43, line 5, after the word "hereby," to strike out:

reappropriated and made immediately available for the purposes of this act, but said appropriation shall remain available for the payment of outstanding liabilities, including the liquidation of damages caused by the abrogation of any existing contracts, entered into under said appropriations and authority.

And insert "covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous items. Authority;" in line 12, before the word "any," to strike out "pay" and insert "settle and adjust;" in line 13, before the word "contracts," to strike out "such" and insert "certain," and in the same line, after the word "contracts," to insert "under former appropriations for a public building at Los Angeles;" in line 16, after the word "and," to strike out "the" and insert "a sum of money sufficient to cover such adjustments and settlements is hereby appropriated. The;" so as to make the clause read:

That the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $100,000, contained in section 3 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1899, entitled "An act to increase the limit of cost for the erection of a public building at Stockton, Cal., and making provision for the acquisition of additional land, or a new site therefor, and to provide for an addition to the public building at Los Angeles, Cal., and appropriating money therefor," together with the unexpended balance of the appropriation for "court-house and post-office at Los Angeles, Cal.; for completion of addition to present building under present limit, $150,000," are hereby covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous items. Authority is hereby given to the Secretary of the Treasury to settle and adjust any claims for damages due to the abrogation of certain contracts under former appropriations for a public building at Los Angeles, provided the amounts thereof can be liquidated for such sums as in his opinion are just and reasonable, and a sum of money sufficient to cover such adjustments and settlements is hereby appropriated. The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby further authorized and empowered to enter into contracts for the erection of the building herein authorized, within the limit of cost hereby fixed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 44, after line 24, to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 19. That the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated to be used and expended by the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States for the following purposes and no other: One hundred and thirty-five thousand dollars of this appropriation for the purchase from the county of Forsyth, State of North Carolina, of a lot of land 200 feet long by 200 feet wide, lying and being in Winston, N. C., and bounded as follows: On the north by Fourth street, on the east by Main street, on the south by Third street, and on the west by Liberty street, together with the public building now standing on said lot, and occupied as a county court-house. Twenty-five thousand dollars of this appropriation to be used and expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury in making all necessary alterations and modifications of the above-described building, and furnishing the same, so as to make the said building suitable and available for a post-office of the United States for Winston-Salem, N. C., and for such other Government offices and purposes as may be required and deemed necessary.

That the Secretary of the Treasury, for and in consideration of the sum of $3,00), to be paid by the county of Forsyth, State of North Carolina, is hereby authorized and directed to sell and properly convey by a deed in fee simple to the county of Forsyth all the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to a certain lot of land lying in the city of Winston, N. C., and bounded as follows: Beginning at an iron stake at the intersection of Fifth and Liberty streets, thence north with Liberty street 125 feet to an iron stake, thence west 125 feet to an iron stake, thence south 125 feet to an iron stake on Fifth street, thence east with Fifth street 125 feet to the beginning, being the lot purchased by the United States from Joseph Jacobs, and recorded in Book 62, page 422, in the office of the register of deeds of Forsyth County. The proceeds of this sale to be deposited in the Treasury as a miscellaneous receipt.

That so much of the act of March 2, 1899, appropriating $60,000 for the erection of a public building for a post-office in Winston-Salem, N. C., and requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to erect a Federal building on the lot purchased, is hereby repealed, and the amount appropriated, and the purpose for which it is to be used and expended, shall be as provided for and set forth in this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 23, page 49, line 1, after the word "Treasury," to strike out "the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General;" in line 5, after the word "Michigan," to strike out "Jacksonville, Fla.;" in the same line, after the word "Texas," to strike out Kalamazoo, Mich;" in line 7, after the word "Tennessee," to strike out "Greensboro, N. C.; Columbus, Ohio;" in line 9, after the word "make," to strike out "reports" and insert "report;" in line 13, after the word "The," to strike out "reports" and insert "report;" and in line 22, after the word "building," to insert:

and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to have prepared plans and specifications for the enlargement of the United States post-office and court-house, or for the construction of a new post-office and court-house, at Columbus, Ohio, as he may deem advisable, at a cost not to exceed $5,000.

So as to make the section read:

SEC. 23. That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States shall cause to be examined the Government buildings in the following cities, to wit: Watertown, N. Y.; Grand Rapids, Mich.; Houston, Tex.; South Bend, Ind.; Duluth, Minn.; Lima, Ohio; Jersey City, N. J.; Knoxville, Tenn.; Syracuse, N. Y., and make report to Congress at its next session showing in detail the condition of the building in each city named, whether of insufficient capacity to transact public business, and if so the most economical and best method of affording relief. The report should show the value of each building and site, the cost of purchasing additional ground and size thereof, the cost of constructing an addition, if one is necessary, or the cost of a new site and building, showing cost of each separately in case that is the only remedy; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to investigate the postal situation at Yonkers, N. Y., and report to Congress at its next session the probable cost of a suitable site in said city upon which to erect a post-office building; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to have prepared plans and specifications for the enlargement of the United States post-office and court-house, or for the construction of a new post-office and court-house, at Columbus, Ohio, as he may deem advisable, at a cost not to exceed $5,000.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I move to amend the amendment by inserting, in line 6, before the words "South Bend," the words "Hilo and Honolulu, Territory of Hawaii; Albuquerque, N. Mex."

Mr. FORAKER. Let Honolulu come first. It is the capital.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I accept the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio. Let it read "Honolulu and Hilo."

Mr. SPOONER. Are both to be court-houses?

Mr. FAIRBANKS. These are simply instructions to the Department to make an investigation as to Government buildings.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 6, before the words "South Bend," insert:

Honolulu and Hilo, Territory of Hawaii; Albuquerque, N. Mex.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds was, on page 50, after line 17, to insert the following as a new section:

SEC. 25. That all buildings authorized to be constructed under the provisions of this act shall be unexposed to danger from fire by an open space of at least 40 feet on each side, including streets and alleys: Provided, That in exceptional cases and for good cause shown the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, reduce the open space to less than 40 feet and to any dimensions which he shall deem sufficient to afford fire protection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I ask the Senate to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the committee was adopted, on page 21, that I may move to substitute for the word "fifty" the word "sixty" before "thousand."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the amendment will be reconsidered. The amendment now proposed by the Senator from Indiana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 6, on page 21, strike out "fifty" and insert "sixty," so as to read:

United States post-office at Torrington, Conn., $60,000.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. On page 29, line 17, I ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. WARREN. It was offered in error.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. It was offered in error.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Indiana asks the Senate to agree to disagree to the amendment of the committee in line 17, page 29, whereby after "South Dakota" the words "five thousand" were stricken out and "seven thousand five hundred" were inserted. In the absence of objection the amendment is agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It now stands, "United States post-office and court-house at Pierre, S. Dak., $5,000."

Mr. FAIRBANKS. It stands at "$5,000."

After line 19, on page 29, I move to insert:

United States post-office at Albuquerque, N. Mex., $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. On page 37 I move to strike out all of section 12, as it has been agreed to, and to insert in lieu thereof what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection, section 12 as heretofore amended will be stricken out, and the Senator from Indiana proposes to insert in lieu thereof what will be read by the Secretary.

The Secretary read as follows:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to erect in the city of Macon, Ga., under the rules and regulations as now prescribed by law, and on such plans as he may determine, a public building to be used as a United States court-house and post-office building and for occupancy by such United States officials as may be located in said city of Macon, to be located upon the property and site in the city of Macon, Ga., whereon is situated the present United States court-house and post-office building, and to expend therefor, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $300,000.

That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and directed to acquire, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise in his discretion, such additional land adjoining said United States court-house and post-office building on Third and Mulbery streets as may be necessary; and in the erection of such new building he shall use such material from the present building as may be suitable.

That the appropriation heretofore made on March 3, 1899, for the enlargement, making additions to, and improvement of the present public building in the city of Macon, Ga., shall be available and used for the purposes of this act; and that the Secretary of the Treasury shall also be authorized to use the net balance arising from the sale of the present site and building owned by the United States and occupied and used as a post-office building and United States court-house in the erection of said new building. That the limit of cost of said additional land and site shall not exceed $31,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I have proposed an amendment to the bill which I should like to have acted upon. Two years ago the Senate and House of Representatives passed a bill for the erection of a building in the city of Anniston, Ala. The Senate put the appropriation at $75,000, but the House cut it down to $50,000. I ask the Secretary to read the amendment which I have proposed.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 7, insert the following:

For the public building in Anniston, Ala., in addition to the sum heretofore appropriated, $25,000.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I will ask the Senator if he has an estimate from the Treasury Department upon that item.

Mr. PETTUS. Yes, sir; and I propose to state the case to the Senate in only a few words.

The Senate thought the building ought to be erected for $75,000. The House cut down the appropriation to $50,000. The Treasury Department, in their efforts to erect a building there, found that a suitable building could not be constructed for $50,000, and the Secretary of the Treasury has written a communication to the committee of the Senate on the subject. It is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 16, 1902.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON PUBLIC BUILDINGS AND GROUNDS,
United States Senate.

SIR: This Department is in receipt, under date of the 15th instant, of a communication from your committee, requesting a report in connection with an amendment intended to be proposed to H. R. 14018, said amendment being "for the public building in Anniston, Ala., in addition to the sum heretofore appropriated, $25,000."

In reply I have the honor to advise you that under the present condition of the market with relation to building material and labor a suitable building of the size necessary to meet the needs of the service at Anniston can not be constructed with the balance available, and it is estimated that an increase of limit from $50,000 to $75,000 will be necessary.

In this connection it is deemed proper to advise you that Anniston is somewhat remote from centers of production of building materials.

Respectfully,

H. A. TAYLOR, Assistant Secretary.

Anniston is on the Southern Railroad.

Mr. FORAKER. By whom is the letter signed?

Mr. PETTUS. By the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

I think that this is not only a modest request, but that it is a reasonable one. The Secretary of the Treasury has not made any start to erect a building because he said he did not have money enough, and I ask that the amendment be agreed to.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I accept the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Alabama, but I suggest to him that I am afraid the amendment will not quite cover what he desires. What the Senator desires, as I understand it, is that the limit of cost shall be increased from $50,000 to $75,000.

Mr. PETTUS. Yes, sir.

Mr. ALLISON. The preamble is all right, but it should not go into the amendment.

Mr. PETTUS. I am very much obliged to the Senator for his suggestion, and I will ask the Secretary to change the amendment so as to conform to the wording of the increases in other cases.

Mr. WARREN. Is the Senator certain as to what the present limit of cost is?

Mr. ALLISON. It is $50,000.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator knows the limit of cost to be $50,000, he ought to say, "the amount is hereby increased from $50,000 to $75,000."

Mr. ALLISON. I have made that suggestion to the Senator from Alabama.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] will he stated as it has been modified.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, after line 7, it is proposed to insert:

The limit of cost of the public building in Anniston, Ala., is hereby increased from $50,000 to $75,000.

Mr. WARREN. That is correct.

Mr. PETTUS. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. On page 10, after line 24, I move to strike out the period after the word "fixed" and insert a comma, and then to insert in addition what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 24, after the word "fixed," it is proposed to strike out the period and insert a comma and the words "unless a higher value be fixed in the condemnation proceedings hereinbefore authorized."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 6 o'clock and 25 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 22, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, May 21, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MARSHAL DE ROCHAMBEAU CEREMONIAL.

The SPEAKER. By the order of the House the Chair lays before it the report of the committee on the Marshal de Rochambeau statue and the programme for Saturday next, to be printed in the RECORD for the information of the House. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 17, 1902.

Hon. D. B. HENDERSON,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

SIR: The undersigned, to whom was committed, by the act of Congress approved February 14, 1902, the selection of a site and the supervision of the erection thereon of a statue of Marshal de Rochambeau, commander in chief of the French forces in America during the war of independence, and of the unveiling of said statue, respectfully report that that they have discharged the duty imposed upon them: that the site selected is the southwest corner of Lafayette Square, where the pedestal has been erected, and that on the 24th day of May, instant, at 11 o'clock a. m., the statue of Marshal de Rochambeau will be unveiled with appropriate ceremonial, Senator HENRY C. LODGE delivering the address. Seats have been reserved for the Senators and Representatives in Congress.

We remain, sir, very respectfully, yours,

JOHN HAY, Secretary of State.
ELIHU ROOT, Secretary of War.
GEO. PEABODY WETMORE,
Chairman Committee on the Library, Senate.
JAMES T. MCCLEARY,
Chairman Committee on the Library, House.

The SPEAKER. It will be unnecessary to read the programme, but it will be printed with the paper just read in the RECORD.

The programme is as follows:

The unveiling of the statue will take place at 11 a. m. There will be a battalion of French seamen, with their band, a battalion of United States engineers, and a battalion of United States marines and sailors, with the Marine Band, present at the statue. After the ceremonies these troops, together with a battalion of cavalry, a battery of field artillery, and a brigade of District of Columbia militia, will pass in review before the President.

Maj. Gen. S. B. M. Young, United States Army, will be in command of the troops.

The programme for the ceremonies of unveiling is as follows:

1. Invocation by Cardinal Gibbons.
2. Welcome by the President of the United States.

Mr. MCCLEARY. Mr. Speaker, for the information of the members of the House I will say that one entire stand has been reserved for the membership of this House. Ours is the west stand, the one on Jackson Place, on the farther side of the park. It will seat 700 persons. No one will be admitted without a ticket. Two tickets for each Representative, one being for himself, will be sent to him by mail, probably to-morrow. The exercises begin at 11 o'clock. There will be three entrances to the statue grounds. The entrance to the stand for the members of this House is on Jackson Place. As the crowd will be large, it is very important that members seek admission at the proper entrance.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn on Friday next it adjourn to meet on the following Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. KYLE, indefinitely, on account of sickness in family.

To Mr. FORDNEY, for ten days, on account of important business.

APPLICATION OF THE STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS IN CERTAIN CASES.

Mr. BOWERSOCK. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4264) providing that the statutes of limitations of the several States shall apply as a defense to actions brought in any courts for the recovery of lands patented under the treaty of May 10, 1854, between the United States of America and the Shawnee tribe of Indians.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in all actions brought in any State court or United States court by any patentee, his heirs, grantees, or any person claiming under such patentee, for the possession or rents or profits of lands patented in severalty to the members of said tribe under the treaty of May 10, 1854, between the United States of America and the Shawnee tribe of Indians, where a deed has been approved by the Secretary of the Interior to the land sought to be recovered, the statutes of limitations of the States in which said land is situate shall be held to apply, and it shall be a complete defense to such action that the same has not been brought within the time prescribed by the statutes of said State the same as if such action had been brought for the recovery of land patented to others than members of the Shawnee tribe of Indians.

SEC. 2. That this act shall not apply to any suits brought within one year from and after its passage.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary, were read:

Line 3, page 1, strike out "State court or."

Page 1, strike out lines 7 and 8 and "Shawnee tribe of Indians" in line 9 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "any tribe of Indians under any treaty between it and the United States of America."

Page 2, lines 4 and 5, strike out "the Shawnee" and insert in lieu thereof the word "any."

Amend the title so as to read: "An act providing that the statute of limitations of the several States shall apply as a defense to actions brought in the United States courts for the recovery of lands patented in severalty to members of any tribe of Indians under any treaty between it and the United States of America."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I would like some explanation of the bill.

Mr. BOWERSOCK. Mr. Speaker, this bill is for the relief of bona fide settlers or purchasers of Indian lands in two or three counties in my State. These lands were sold by parties who had a right to sell them, and the titles were confirmed by the Secretary of the Interior. The purchasers have been in undisputed possession for a quarter of a century or more, but now there are parties who for some claimed defect bring suit, or threaten to bring suit, against these bona fide settlers, and then after disturbing their titles or casting a cloud upon them offer to settle for some nominal sum. The object of the bill is simply to have the statute of limitations apply in these cases and protect from speculators actual purchasers.

Mr. FLYNN. I would like to ask the gentleman, does this only apply to lands which have been confirmed by or received the approval of the Secretary of the Interior?

The SPEAKER. This conversation is for the benefit of the House, and gentlemen must speak louder if they wish to be heard.

Mr. BOWERSOCK. It is the intention that this shall only apply to those titles that have been approved by the Secretary of the Interior. There is a letter printed in the report from the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I have been requested on this side of the Chamber to make a statement in connection with the statement made by the gentleman from Kansas. I was on the subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee that investigated this matter, and it met the unanimous approval of the subcommittee and also of the full committee. The object of the bill is to prevent that sort of a system of levying blackmail against these bona fide settlers, the owners of the land, and that is the whole object of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I should like to know something about the bill. I have not understood the situation at all.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas wants some information about the bill. He has not heard a word that was said. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOWERSOCK. As I have already stated, Mr. Speaker, the bill is to allow the statute of limitations to apply to quiet some Indian titles in two or three counties in the State of Kansas where deeds were approved by the Secretary of the Interior long years ago.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BOWERSOCK. Mr. Speaker, there was misapprehension in reporting the first amendment recommended by the committee, and I desire that that be disagreed to.

The SPEAKER. A vote will be taken on all the committee amendments except the first.

The question was taken, and the amendments recommended by the committee, with the exception of the first, were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the first amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3, page 1, strike out "State court or."

The amendment was considered, and disagreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BOWERSOCK, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

IMPROVEMENTS ON NOXUBEE RIVER, MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. FOX. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 14109) to authorize the Macon Ice, Light, and Power Company to construct certain improvements on the Noxubee River in the State of Mississippi.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Macon Ice, Light, and Power Company, a corporation chartered under the laws of the State of Mississippi, be, and they are hereby, authorized, at a point on the Noxubee River just below and within 200 feet of the iron bridge on said river at and near the city of Macon, in the county of Noxubee and in said State, to construct a dam across and on said river, and to erect at or near said dam such buildings and machinery as may be necessary and suitable for the generation of electric light, the manufacture of ice, and such other products as the said corporation may be authorized by law to manufacture, and to place in said river at said dam such power wheels and other appliances as may be necessary to propel said machinery: Provided, That said buildings, dams, and machinery shall be constructed and erected according to such plans and specifications as may be authorized by law: And provided further, That the construction of said dam, buildings, etc., shall be commenced within one year from the passage of this act.

The following amendments, reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, were read:

In line 3, page 1, after the word "That," insert "the consent of Congress is hereby given to."

In lines 4 and 5, page 1, strike out the words "be, and they are hereby, authorized" and insert "to construct."

In line 8, page 1, strike out the words "to construct."

Strike out the word "That," in line 2, and all of lines 3, 4, 5, 6, and 7, page 2, and add the following:

"That the structures herein authorized shall be built in accordance with such plans as may be approved by the Chief of Engineers and the Secretary of War, and until the said plans are so approved the structure shall not be commenced: Provided further, That any change or modification of said structures which the Secretary of War at any time in the future shall deem necessary in the interest of navigation shall be promptly made by the said company at its own expense, and the Secretary of War shall have authority to require the complete removal of the structures, if in his judgment the interests of navigation demand it, and such removal shall be made by the company at its own expense.

"SEC. 2. That the said company shall provide, in connection with said dam, such suitable fishways as may be required by the United States Fish Commission.

"SEC. 3. That this act shall be null and void unless the construction of said dam and the works incident thereto shall be commenced within one year and completed within two years from the date hereof.

"SEC. 4. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FOX, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS IN WYOMING.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 5908) granting homesteaders on the abandoned Fort Bridger, Fort Sanders, and Fort Laramie military reservations, in Wyoming, the right to purchase one quarter section of public land on said reservations as pasture or grazing land.

Be it enacted, etc., That each person who has exercised the right of homestead entry on the abandoned Fort Bridger Reservation, or on the Fort Sanders or the Fort Laramie abandoned military reservations, in the State of Wyoming, and is now residing on said reservations under the provisions and requirements of the homestead law, or who is the owner in fee of 160 acres thereon by purchase, shall, upon proper proof of settlement, homestead, or other legal title upon said reservations, be entitled to the right to purchase, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, at $1.25 per acre, not exceeding one quarter section of the public lands on said reservations as pasture or grazing land not otherwise disposed of: Provided, That land so purchased be unfitted for cultivation and homestead entry by reason of lack of water for irrigating purposes or otherwise: And provided further, That said purchase of pasture or grazing land shall not, with the land heretofore entered by the applicant, exceed in the aggregate 320 acres.

The amendments reported by the Committee on the Public Lands were read, as follows:

In line 3, page 1, strike out the word "exercised" and insert in lieu thereof the words "or may hereafter exercise."

In line 6, page 1, after the word "reservations," insert "or the abandoned Fort Laramie Wood Reservation, to which the homestead laws are hereby extended."

In line 6, page 1, strike out the word "now."

In line 8, page 1, after the word "is," insert the words "a resident and."

Amend the title by adding after the word "reservations," in line 2 of the title, the words "and Fort Laramie Wood Reservation;" and by adding to the title the words "and for other purposes."

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, I ask the gentleman in charge of this bill how much land is involved in it? What is the area of these several reservations?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, this bill applies to four abandoned military reservations in Wyoming. The area of vacant land on the Fort Sanders Reservation is 5,000 acres; on Fort Bridger Reservation, 4,800 acres; on Fort Laramie Reservation, 25,000 acres, and on Fort Laramie Wood Reservation, about 30,000 acres. These reservations were opened to entry under the homestead law from eight to twelve years ago. Settlers went upon them and took as homesteads practically all the land which was fit for cultivation. There is no way in which settlers can acquire any additional land on the reservations adjacent to their homesteads. They now desire to purchase at $1.25 an acre, not exceeding 160 acres for each settler, vacant land unfit for cultivation or homestead entry, provided that the aggregate of land which any settler shall own shall not exceed 320 acres, including the purchase he may make from the Government.

This is an opportunity for the Government to sell some land which is practically worthless—fit only for grazing purposes, not fit for settlement—for $1.25 an acre.

The bill also provides for opening to homestead settlement a small abandoned reservation which has recently been surveyed, but not opened to settlement; and the law relative to the purchase of grazing lands, not exceeding 160 acres to each settler, is to apply to this reservation also.

Mr. SHAFROTH rose.

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. CLAYTON. Before the gentleman from Colorado proceeds, let me ask a question. Does this bill meet the approval of the Interior Department?

Mr. MONDELL. The Interior Department does not object to it. That Department was not disposed to pass on the question at all. In the last Congress we passed a similar bill applying to an abandoned military reservation in Wyoming, and that act has worked very well indeed.

Mr. CLAYTON. This bill comes here as the unanimous report of the Committee on the Public Lands?

Mr. MONDELL. It does.

Mr. SHAFROTH. This bill provides, as I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the land to be taken up under it shall be grazing lands. Such land in the arid region is not worth a great deal of money unless it is contiguous to some man's farm, in which case it may be worth $1.25 or $1.50 an acre. But grazing land off by itself is worth very little money indeed.

Now, here is an opportunity, it seems to me, for the Government to get the full value of its land and at the same time accommodate some settlers. The very fact that the land has not been located upon for homesteads demonstrates conclusively that it is not valuable land. This being grazing land, of course a person can not erect a house there and make a living on it. It seems to me the bill ought to pass.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. At what price was this land originally sold to the settlers?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Under the homestead act they got it free—the 160 acres—and now they want some more land, probably for the purpose of accommodating the stock that is on their land, on their own 160 acres. This land is lying there and will likely lie there for years without the Government getting a nickel for it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. How long since they took up the original tracts of land?

Mr. SHAFROTH. The first of these military reservations was opened about twelve years ago, and they have had all that time to locate homestead entries upon it and they have not done it, and the very fact that no one wants it demonstrates it is not very valuable land.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has the land been subject to entry all this time?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; as I understand.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. As free homesteads?

Mr. SHAFROTH. As free homesteads.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And no one has taken it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No one.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was read a third time, and passed.

By unanimous consent, the title was amended so as to read as follows:

An act granting homesteaders on the abandoned Fort Bridger, Fort Sanders, and Fort Laramie Military reservations and Fort Laramie wood reservation, in Wyoming, the right to purchase one quarter section of public land on said reservations as pasture or grazing land, and for other purposes.

On motion of Mr. MONDELL, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE COLUMBIA RIVER.

Mr. DAVIS of Florida. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2782) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River by the Washington and Oregon Railway Company.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Florida asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2782), which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate bill 2782, to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River by the Washington and Oregon Railway Company.

The bill was read at length.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DAVIS of Florida, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

YOUNG MEN'S CHRISTIAN ASSOCIATION.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3129) for the authorization of the erection of buildings by the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations on the military reservations of the United States, which I will send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That authority is hereby given to the Secretary of War, in his discretion, to grant permission by revocable license to the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Associations of North America to erect and maintain, on the military reservations within the United States or its island possessions, such buildings as their work for the promotion of the social, physical, intellectual, and moral welfare of the garrisons may require, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may impose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3129) which the Clerk has read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question now is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ESCH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 9969, similar in its provisions to the one just passed, lie on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, that order will be made. There was no objection.

FORT NIOBRARA MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. NEVILLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3666) to authorize the sale of a part of the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, in the State of Nebraska, which I will ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to sell to the village of Valentine, Nebr., the northwest quarter of section 29, and the northeast quarter of section 30, and the east one-half of the southeast quarter of section 30, and the east half of section 31, all in township 34 north of range 27 west of the sixth principal meridian, Cherry County, State of Nebraska, now a part of the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, for the sum of $1,440.

SEC. 2. That upon payment of said sum by the said village of Valentine the patent of the United States shall issue conveying the said lands to the said village in its corporate name, or to its duly constituted official board, as may be desired, and thereupon and thereafter title to the said land described shall be in said village of Valentine.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk has read. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if this bill has been recommended by the Secretary of War.

Mr. NEVILLE. Yes. There are 720 acres involved. It was abandoned for the purpose of being sold under the act of 1885, with reference to abandoned and useless military reservations. The sale has been recommended by the Secretary of the Interior. The sale was postponed for the purpose of having this act go through Congress, in order that the village of Valentine might obtain it for a park.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. NEVILLE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

DAM ACROSS ST. LAWRENCE RIVER.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11657) allowing the construction of a dam across the St. Lawrence River, which I will ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas it is represented that the government of the Dominion of Canada, with a view of improving the navigation of the channel excavated through the rapids at the head of Les Galops Island, in the St. Lawrence River, proposes to construct a dam from Adams Island, in Canadian territory, to Les Galops Island, in United States territory; and

Whereas the consent of the United States to the construction of that part of the work which will be upon United States territory is desired: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That consent is hereby given for the construction of the portion of the aforesaid dam which crosses or abuts upon the territory of the United States: Provided, That the type of the proposed dam and the plans of construction and operation thereof shall be such as will not, in the judgment of the Secretary of War, materially affect the water level of Lake Ontario or the St. Lawrence River or cause any other injury to the interests of the United States or any citizen thereof: And provided further, That the work of construction on United States territory shall not be commenced until plans and details of the work shall have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which the Clerk has just read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

COMMUTATION OF SENTENCES OF UNITED STATES PRISONERS.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 14411) to regulate commutation for good conduct for United States prisoners.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That each prisoner who has been or shall hereafter be convicted of any offense against the laws of the United States, and is confined, in execution of the judgment or sentence upon any such conviction, in any United States penitentiary, or in any penitentiary, prison, or jail of any State or Territory, for a definite term, other than for life, whose record of conduct shows that he has faithfully observed all the rules and has not been subjected to punishment, shall be entitled to a deduction from the term of his sentence to be estimated as follows, commencing on the first day of his arrival at the penitentiary, prison, or jail: Upon a sentence of not less than six months nor more than one year, five days for each month; upon a sentence of more than one year and less than three years, six days for each month; upon a sentence of not less than three years and less than five years, seven days for each month; upon a sentence of not less than five years and less than ten years, eight days for each month; upon a sentence of ten years or more, ten days for each month. When a prisoner has two or more sentences, the aggregate of his several sentences shall be the basis upon which his deduction shall be estimated.

SEC. 2. That in the case of convicts in any United States penitentiary, the Attorney-General shall have the power to restore to any such convict who has heretofore or may hereafter forfeit any good time by violating any existing law or prison regulation such portion of lost good time as may be proper, in his judgment, upon recommendations and evidence submitted to him by the warden in charge. Restoration, in the case of the United States convicts confined in State and Territorial institutions, shall be regulated in accordance with the rules governing such institutions, respectively.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect and be in force from and after thirty days from the date of its approval, and shall apply only to sentences imposed by courts subsequent to the time that this act takes effect, as hereinbefore provided. Prisoners serving under any sentence imposed prior to such time shall be entitled and receive the commutation heretofore allowed under existing laws. Such existing laws are hereby repealed as to all sentences imposed subsequent to the time when this act takes effect.

The following amendment recommended by the Committee on the Judiciary was read:

On page 1, in line 6, after the word "penitentiary," insert the words "or jail."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LANHAM, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

SANTA FE PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 10299) authorizing the Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Company to sell or lease its property and franchises, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation incorporated under the act of Congress approved March 3, 1897, entitled "An act to define the rights of purchasers under mortgages authorized by an act of Congress approved April 20, 1871, concerning the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company," be, and it hereby is, authorized and empowered to sell or lease its railroad and other property, including all rights, powers, privileges, grants, and franchises, to the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company, a corporation of the State of Kansas, its successors and assigns; but such purchaser or lessee shall take, hold, and use the railroad and property sold or leased subject to all duties, obligations, conditions, and restrictions relating thereto which at the time of such sale or lease shall be binding upon said Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Company as fully as though such sale or lease had not been made; and thereupon such purchaser or lessee shall have and enjoy all rights, powers, privileges, grants, and franchises relating to said railroad and property, or any part thereof, that were conferred by Congress upon said Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Company: Provided, however, That said railroad shall remain as heretofore a post route and military road, subject to the use of the United States for postal, military, naval, and all other Government service, and also subject to such regulations as Congress may impose restricting the charges for such Government transportation, and subject also to all other rights of the United States.

The following amendments, recommended by the Committee on Pacific Railroads, were read:

Page 1, line 11, strike out the word "immunities," and insert in lieu thereof the word "grants."

On page 2, line 8, strike out the word "immunities," and insert in lieu thereof the following words: "powers, privileges, grants."

Also the adding of the following new sections:

"SEC. 2. That from and after the passage of this act the said Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Company, its successors or assigns, shall pay an annual tax at the rate of $175 per mile to the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona for each mile of track in said Territories, the same to be apportioned among the counties of said Territories in which said railroad is located according to the mileage in each county, respectively, and said taxes shall be in lieu of all other taxes on said property hereby authorized to be leased or sold, except the land-grant lands, and the shops as hereinafter otherwise provided, and the payment of said tax shall be made on or before the 1st day of December of every year after 1902, until the said Territories, or either of them, have been admitted into the United States of America as States; and that upon the admission of the said Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, or either of them, as States, the property hereby authorized to be transferred, situated therein, shall be subject to all the laws and regulations of either of the said States of New Mexico or Arizona, in the same manner and to the same extent as any other railroad property situated therein. The payment of the said $175 a mile shall not extend to or apply to any of the land-grant lands owned by the said Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Company which are in no wise connected with the right of way and station grounds of said company, said land-grant lands to remain as now chargeable with taxes as assessed and collected under and by virtue of the laws of the said Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, and the shops situated at Albuquerque, N. Mex., including the machinery therein, and the lands upon which the same are situated, shall be assessed separately and the taxes thereon paid annually according to the laws of New Mexico.

"SEC. 3. That the sale or lease herein authorized shall be made on or before January 1, 1904; otherwise this act shall become inoperative for all purposes.

"SEC. 4. Congress shall at all times have power to alter, amend, or repeal this act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. We should like to have some explanation.

Mr. MADDOX. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to hear this bill explained by somebody.

The SPEAKER. An explanation is desired.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Mr. Speaker, this bill comes unanimously from the Committee on Pacific Railroads, having been very carefully considered and several hearings given. The members were present. The bill gives no new power or authority to the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad. It enables that company to take formally what it really owns.

The only question that has ever arisen regarding the propriety of this bill has come from the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico, which were directly affected by it. An agreement has been arrived at between the company and the Delegates from Arizona and New Mexico, which agreement is amicable and satisfactory.

I will say, if the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] desires, that, in 1866, the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company was chartered by Federal law to build a railroad to the Pacific Ocean. That company never completed the road. In fact, the company failed, and but a small portion of the line was built. The Government has no claim whatever upon it.

No one is interested in it save the present owners of the property, the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railroad Company. The Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company failed, was sold out, and bid in by the Santa Fe Pacific Company, with no power under the law to assign or sell it again. The stock has been acquired by the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe, and they now hold and own it. This is simply to enable them to take it over formally, in order that their securities may extend over the entire property and in order that it may be more economically administered. It affects 550 miles of road, 153 miles in New Mexico and 397 miles in Arizona, and it concerns no other part of the line. Now, as I have said, the only people directly affected were the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico.

Mr. MADDOX. The Government has no interest in it?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. None whatever. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. MADDOX] further, for I think it is my duty, that under the original act the Atlantic and Pacific Company were exempt from taxation. When the Santa Fe Pacific acquired the Atlantic and Pacific, they contended that they also were exempt from taxation and that the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico had no power to tax them; but, in order that the Territories might be assisted, and with a willingness to pay whatever was reasonable and fair, the owners of the Santa Fe Pacific have paid for several years to the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico taxes upon which both parties have agreed. This bill fixes the rate of taxation in this enabling act—for it is purely an enabling act—and gives them no additional power. Indeed, it compromises somewhat their original rights, because it agrees with the Territories as to the measure of taxation in the future.

Now, my friend from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] will no doubt be able to explain to the gentleman from Georgia and his colleagues his position in reference to the matter.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. In just a minute. The unanimous report of the committee on this bill is as follows:

The Committee on Pacific Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10299) authorizing the Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Company to sell or lease its railroad property and franchises, and for other purposes, beg leave to submit the following report and recommend that said bill do pass with amendments:

The Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Company was incorporated under act of Congress approved March 3, 1897, entitled "An act to define the rights of purchasers under mortgages authorized by an act of Congress approved April 20, 1871, concerning the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company."

The road of the company extends from a connection with the rails of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company at Isleta, N. Mex., to the Colorado River, on the western boundary of Arizona, and thus forms part of the transcontinental Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway system.

The object of the bill is to permit the Santa Fe Pacific Company to sell or lease its railroad and other property to the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company. The latter company is now the owner of all the capital stock and all of the outstanding bonds of the Santa Fe Pacific Company. The transfer thus authorized is intended simply to provide for a more economical administration of the property. It will enable the real owner—the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company—to make a large saving in the keeping of accounts and avoid the duplication of offices, etc., and will be to the manifest advantage of the public in dealing with one single corporation, operating in its own name the entire system.

The original act of Congress creating the Santa Fe Pacific Company, above cited, does not authorize such sale or lease, and hence this additional authority is desired. As the proposed legislation will in no manner enlarge any rights held by the Santa Fe Pacific Company under existing law, nor confer any additional rights and privileges whatsoever upon the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Railway Company not now possessed by the Santa Fe Pacific Company under its present charter, and as the transfer is in the line of essential economy and public convenience, the committee strongly favor its passage. The bill is recommended for the further reason that, with the amendments suggested below, the question of taxation of this railroad property in the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, which has caused much trouble and dispute in said Territories, is removed.

While the Santa Fe Pacific Company is claimed to be exempt from taxation under the provisions of the original Atlantic and Pacific charter, it has been voluntarily paying $125 per mile per annum tax in said Territories under agreements with the Territorial authorities. The amendment noted below provides that the Santa Fe Pacific Company and its proposed successor in the record ownership of this property—the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe Company—shall hereafter pay taxes at the rate of $175 per mile until each of said Territories is admitted as a State. The legislation as proposed is entirely satisfactory to the Delegates from the Territories. The authorities of the counties through which the railroad now runs in each of the Territories are urging the passage of this measure (as shown by dispatches and letters on file with your committee), so as to give them more revenue from these increased taxes and settle all questions of possible dispute.

Your committee recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

I now yield to the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company claims exemption from taxation under the transfer to it by the Santa Fe Pacific. I have contended that the exemption held by the Santa Fe Pacific did not pass to the Atlantic and Pacific. The Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe, in extending its system, bought the Atlantic and Pacific, the road now in question here, which passes through a part of New Mexico and all of Arizona. In the transfer of the road in the first instance, as above stated, the question arose as to whether or not this road was exempt from taxation under the purchase. The Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe have purchased the Atlantic and Pacific stock and desire to have title passed under this bill. That has been the question between me and the railroad here, I contending that that transfer did not exempt the road from taxation, and the road contending that it did. But in this compromise it is agreed, and the bill provides, that the company shall pay to the counties through which it passes a tax of $175 a mile on the road, beside a tax on the railroad land grants. So that this law is better for the Territories than the present conditions.

Mr. FINLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FINLEY. The rate of taxation heretofore has been $125 a mile?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes, sir; the road has paid a compromise tax of that amount.

Mr. FINLEY. And this bill increases it to $175 a mile?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes, sir; it increases it to $175 a mile on the railroad, and settles all further dispute in the courts over the question of exemption. If the court should finally decide that the road had no exemption, we would then get very little more than the $175 per mile, as this is nearly the rate paid by roads having no exemption.

I can not say that I am entirely satisfied with the bill, but considering the necessities of the counties through which the road passes, and having received resolutions from the boards of supervisors of several of the counties favoring a bill providing for the payment of $150 per mile, and having obtained a settlement at $175 per mile, I was constrained to give my assent to this measure. This bill provides that when these Territories become States the railroad shall make no claim to any exemption whatever, but submits itself without controversy to the taxing power of the State as other railroads are subject.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I yield to the gentleman from New Mexico.

Mr. RODEY. Mr. Speaker, in behalf of New Mexico in reference to this bill I would like to state that New Mexico agrees to it also, and further I would say that in the act of 1866 creating the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Congress exempted in the two Territories the right of way of this railroad from taxation. It was contended by the Territories that the right of way did not include anything but the mere land, and did not include the superstructure, the ties and the rails, the station grounds, etc. Litigation arose over the question and a case went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and it was held that the superstructure was included in the term "right of way," and therefore wholly exempted this railroad as to that property from all taxation.

After this transfer—after the foreclosure of the suit of the bondholders against the railroad, as just mentioned by the chairman of the committee—an act of Congress was passed permitting the Santa Fe Pacific Company to purchase the road, but the word "immunities" was omitted from it, so we contended thereafter that the right of way in the hands of the new company was subject to taxation. The railroad resisted this contention, but still compromised its taxes annually. In the present act, as first introduced, the missing word was supplied, but the Delegates from both Territories were not satisfied with it. That is the reason the amendment is suggested by the committee, as just read, leaving out the word "immunities," so that they will be in just the same position as before, and as we contend will not be exempt; and further, this agreement to pay $175 tax per mile will be a reasonable tax in the future. This matter has been fully considered and agreed to by the county commissioners of the counties through which the road runs in each of the Territories, as well as by the prominent officials of New Mexico, and is recommended by the counsel who prosecuted the tax suits against the company. The people most interested and who know best about it in New Mexico have agreed to it as a reasonable measure, and have advised me not to resist its passage, but have urged me to help its passage. The chairman has fully explained the reasons why such an act is necessary at all. Congress, by the closing section of the act, retains control of the matter should it be found to work any injury.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken, and the amendments recommended by the committee were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

LORILLARD SPENCER.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill S. 3848.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 3848) granting a deed of quitclaim and release to Lorillard Spencer, his heirs and assigns, of all the right, title, and interest in and to certain land in the city of Newport, R. I.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to execute, acknowledge, and deliver, in the name of the United States of America, a deed of quitclaim and release to Lorillard Spencer, of Newport, R. I., his heirs and assigns, of all the right, title, and interest which was granted to the United States of America by a deed from Elisha Brown to the United States of America, dated the 15th day of November, A. D. 1808, and recorded in volume 11 of the Land Evidence of the city of Newport, in the county of Newport, in the State of Rhode Island, at pages 11 and 12, in and to the land described in said deed, upon the payment by him of the sum of $25.

Mr. PAYNE. Reserving the right to object, I ask for an explanation of this bill.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Speaker, I will explain to my colleague, if the gentleman from Arkansas permits. The bill was introduced by Mr. BULL of Rhode Island. During the war of 1812 the Government of the United States obtained from the then owner of a little piece of land where the city of Newport now stands, on Halidon Hill, the right to erect a battery on about a quarter or half an acre of land, and the right to take the sod from the adjacent land, comprising about an acre or two. The United States never availed itself of the right. It never erected a battery there, and never has used it up to this time. The ground has all been built over, and passed into other hands.

The present owner of the property, in trying to negotiate a sale or borrow money, I have forgotten which, found this cloud upon the title, and we have inserted in the bill a provision that they shall pay the United States, I think, $25 or $50. The bill removes that cloud from the title. It is recommended by the War Department and the engineers in charge of all the fortifications in that section. They say it will never be used, can not be used, and is of no earthly value. But it creates a cloud on the title of the owner. That is all there is of it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. RAY of New York, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

COMPENSATION OF DISTRICT SUPERINTENDENTS IN THE LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill 1026.

The bill was read, as follows:

A bill (S. 1026) to fix the compensation of district superintendents in the Life-Saving Service.

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act the compensation of district superintendents in the Life-Saving Service shall be $2,000 per annum each: Provided, however, That in case the Secretary of the Treasury deems it necessary for any superintendent to employ a clerk, he may allow a sum not exceeding $500 per annum for the compensation of such clerk in addition to the salary paid the superintendent.

SEC. 2. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. CLAYTON. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman this question. How much does this increase the salary of the superintendents of the Life-Saving Service?

Mr. LOVERING. The superintendents now receive from $1,600 to $1,800 a year.

Mr. CLAYTON. What reason is there for this increase?

Mr. LOVERING. To promote the efficiency of the Life-Saving Service.

Mr. CLAYTON. It is found necessary to give more to these men——

Mr. LOVERING. Yes; it is found necessary to increase their compensation.

Mr. CLAYTON. In order to better the efficiency of the service?

Mr. LOVERING. Absolutely.

Mr. CLAYTON. One more question. Does this come from your committee with a unanimous report?

Mr. LOVERING. It comes with a unanimous report.
Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I object.
The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

HOUSE DIGEST AND MANUAL OF RULES AND PRACTICE.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Printing, I call up House resolution 264.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 2,600 copies of the Digest and Manual of the Rules and Practice of the House of Representatives for the second session of the Fifty-seventh Congress, the same to be bound and distributed under the direction of the Speaker and Clerk of the House.

The resolution was considered, and agreed to.

USE OF NEW PUBLIC-PRINTING BUILDING BY THE GRAND ARMY.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I am further directed by the Committee on Printing to call up the bill (H. R. 14189) to permit the occupancy of the public-printing building by the Grand Army of the Republic.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Public Printer of the United States and the engineer officer in charge of the construction of the public-printing building are hereby directed and authorized to permit the soldiers of the Grand Army of the Republic to occupy the new public-printing building for sleeping purposes from the 5th day of October, 1902, to the 13th day of October, 1902, both days inclusive.

The Grand Army of the Republic to furnish the same for sleeping purposes at their own expense and to leave the building in as perfect state of cleanliness and repair as when they took it. The occupancy of the same to be under the control of the Public Printer and the engineer officer in charge.

The following committee amendments were read:

In line 4, before the word "public-printing," insert the word "new."

Also, in the same line, after the word "public-printing," insert the word "office."

Strike out the word "the" in line 5 and the word "soldiers" in line 6, and insert in lieu thereof the words "duly accredited members."

In line 7, after the word "public-printing," insert the word "office."

Also, in the same line, after the word "purposes," insert the word "only."

In line 11, before the word "Grand," insert the words "officers of the;" and in the same line strike out the word "to" and insert in lieu thereof the words "or members thereof shall."

In line 12, after the word "purposes," insert the word "only;" in the same line, after the word "expense," insert the words "and properly police and protect the same," and in the same line strike out the word "to."

In line 14 strike out the word "to" and insert in lieu thereof the word "shall."

In line 15, after the word "control," insert the words "and supervision;" so that the bill will read as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That the Public Printer of the United States and the engineer officer in charge of the construction of the new public-printing office building are hereby directed and authorized to permit duly accredited members of the Grand Army of the Republic to occupy the new public-printing office building for sleeping purposes only from the 5th day of October, 1902, to the 13th day of October, 1902, both days inclusive.

"The officers of the Grand Army of the Republic or members thereof shall furnish the same for sleeping purposes only at their own expense, and properly police and protect the same and leave the building in as perfect state of cleanliness and repair as when they took it. The occupancy of the same shall be under the control and supervision of the Public Printer and the engineer officer in charge."

The SPEAKER. This requires unanimous consent. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if this bill contemplates that the Public Printing Office building will be used by the Grand Army prior to the occupation by the Government Printing Office itself?

Mr. HEATWOLE. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is not supposed that by the date mentioned here it will be in such a state of completion as that the Printing Office itself can be moved into it?

Mr. HEATWOLE. No; the Public Printer and the engineer officer in charge have been consulted, and they have agreed to it.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It will be occupied by the Grand Army in its unfinished condition and before its occupation by the Printing Office?

Mr. HEATWOLE. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

CONSOLIDATED REPORTS OF GETTYSBURG NATIONAL PARK COMMISSION.

Mr. HEATWOLE. Mr. Speaker, I am further directed by the Committee on Printing to call up the Senate joint resolution No. 46.

The Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Joint resolution to provide for the printing of 6,000 copies of the consolidated reports of the Gettysburg National Park Commission, 1893 to 1901, inclusive.

Resolved, etc., That there be printed 6,000 copies of the consolidated reports of the Gettysburg National Park Commission, 1893 to 1901, inclusive, of which 2,000 shall be for the Senate, 2,000 for the House of Representatives, 1,000 for the office of the Secretary of War, and 1,000 for the Gettysburg National Park Commission.

The Clerk read the following amendments recommended by the committee:

In line 3 strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

In line 6, between the words "which" and "thousand," strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "one."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendments were agreed to.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

COPIES OF CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. TATE. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report back and ask for immediate consideration the bill (S. 2296) to amend an act approved March 2, 1895, relating to public printing.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the tenth paragraph of the printing act of March 2, 1895, following the paragraph which reads, "The Public Printer shall furnish the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as follows, and shall furnish gratuitously no others in addition thereto," be amended so that such tenth paragraph shall read as follows: "To the library of each of the eight Executive Departments, and to the Naval Observatory, Smithsonian Institution, United States National Museum, the Department of Labor, and Civil Service Commission, one bound copy."

Mr. TATE. I would like to have the report read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

Your Committee on Printing, having had under consideration Senate bill No. 2296, being an act to amend an act relating to public printing, beg to submit the following in lieu thereof, with the recommendation that it do pass:

Be it enacted, etc., That the first and tenth paragraphs of the printing act of January 12, 1895, following the paragraph which reads "The Public Printer shall furnish the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as follows and shall furnish gratuitously no others in addition thereto," be amended by striking out of said first paragraph the word "forty-four" between the word "Senator" and "copies" in the first line and insert in lieu thereof the word "eighty-eight;" and by striking out the word "thirty" betwcen the words "Delegate" and "copies" in the fourth line of said paragraph and insert in lieu thereof the word "sixty;" and by inserting in the ninth line of said first paragraph, after the word "copies" and before the word "to," the following: "and to the Clerk for the use of members of the House of Representatives 50 copies." And amend said tenth paragraph by inserting in the third line thereof, between the words "Museum" and "one," the words, "the Department of Labor and Civil Service Commission," and further amend said tenth paragraph by striking out in the second line the word "and" between the words "Institution" and "the."

The SPEAKER. This requires unanimous consent. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were considered, and agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HEATWOLE, a motion to reconsider the several votes by which the bills and resolutions from the Committee on Printing were passed, was, upon his motion, laid on the table.

DONATION TO ALABAMA OF SPARS OF CERTAIN SHIPS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 10144) to donate to the State of Alabama the spars of the captured battle ships Don Juan d'Austria and Almirante Oquendo, with Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

LOAN OF REVOLUTIONARY TROPHIES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 172) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Morgan Memorial Association of Winchester, Va., certain Revolutionary trophies at Allegheny Arsenal, Pittsburg, Pa.

The amendment was read, as follows:

After the word "Morgan," in line 9, insert "in such manner that their safety from unlawful removal will be assured, and their return if called for by Congress."

Mr. HAY. I move that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF SUPERVISORS IN THE LIFE-SAVING SERVICE.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I objected a few moments ago to a bill which the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING] asked to have passed—the bill (S. 1026) to fix the compensation of district supervisors in the Life-Saving Service. I objected under a misapprehension. I now withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there further objection?

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, the districts of these supervisors differ very materially in extent—some not exceeding 50 or 75 miles in length; others extending over a coast line of 1,500 miles. The law as originally passed gave these supervisors graded rates of salary. This bill proposes to put them all upon the same grade. I think that a bill of this kind should not pass. The duties of these supervisiors are by no means identical in extent.

A MEMBER. Oh, do not object.

Mr. LOUD. Yes; I will object to a bill of this character. I would not object to a bill increasing the salaries of these men upon a graded basis. I believe they should have an increase of salary, but I do not believe they should all receive the same salary.

Mr. LOVERING. May I be permitted to make a statement?

Mr. LOUD. I am willing to reserve the right to object.

Mr. LOVERING. It is well known that the duties of these district superintendents have increased within the last twenty years, being three or four times greater than they formerly were. In this bill as first drawn it was proposed to give these officers $500 extra; that is, to make their salaries $2,500 instead of $2,000. The Senate cut down the amount to $2,000, with a provision for an extra allowance of $500 for clerk hire in certain cases. It is agreed on all hands—by the Department and by everybody else familiar with the circumstances—that these men are not overpaid at $2,000; and it would be only proper that they should all be brought up to that grade, with a provision for extra clerk hire where the circumstances justify it.

Mr. LOUD. If the gentleman's bill proposed an increase of $200 for each of these supervisors, I would not object. I believe they should have additional compensation, but I do not believe they ought all to be put upon the same plane.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. LONG, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. MILLER, for ten days, on account of important business.

BOMBARDMENT OF TAKU FORTS IN CHINA.

Mr. HITT. I desire to present a privileged report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I report back with an amendment the resolution of inquiry which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish this House copies of the complete correspondence, including cable messages, between the Navy Department and Rear-Admiral Kempff, then in command of the American naval forces, in relation to the bombardment of the Taku forts in China.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs was read, as follows:

After the word "hereby," in line 2, insert "if not incompatible with the public interests."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was adopted.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted was laid on the table.

NORTH CAROLINA ELECTION CONTEST—FOWLER V. THOMAS.

Mr. OLMSTED. By direction of the Committee on Elections No. 2, I call up for present consideration the privileged resolutions accompanying the report of that committee upon the contested-election case of Fowler v. Thomas, from the Third Congressional district of North Carolina.

The report, with the accompanying resolutions, is as follows:

The Committee on Elections No. 2, to which was referred the contested-election case of John E. Fowler v. Charles R. Thomas, respectfully present the following report:

The Third Congressional district of North Carolina is composed of the nine counties of Bladen, Craven, Cumberland, Duplin, Harnett, Jones, Moore, Onslow, and Sampson.

The returns of the Congressional election of November 6, 1900, as certified, show that Charles R. Thomas, the contestee, received 13,541 votes, and John E. Fowler, the contestant, received 11,632 votes; scattering, 10. Mr. Thomas received an apparent plurality of 1,909 over Mr. Fowler, and a majority of 1,893 over all.

At an earlier election held in North Carolina in August, 1900, State officers were elected and a new constitution was, or is said to have been, adopted, containing provisions intended to greatly restrict the right of suffrage in said State. It did not, however, and was not intended to, take effect upon the Congressional election of that year, which was held under the preexisting constitution and laws of the State, and therefore no question arising under the new constitution is involved in this controversy.

Mr. Fowler, the contestant, was the nominee of the Populist party. Mr. Thomas, the contestee, was the nominee of the Democratic party. The Republican party had no candidate and did not, as an organization, indorse the nominee of either the Populist or Democratic party.

The contestant submits that the true result, according to the evidence and the law, should be declared as follows:

Reject the returned vote of Craven County, which gave contestee a majority of	911
Reject the returned vote of Duplin County, which gave contestee a majority of	810
Simpson County:
Give Fowler a net gain in North Clinton of 60 votes	60
Add to contestant's vote in Honeycutts precinct 2 votes	2
Add to contestant's vote in South Clinton 4 votes	4
Add to contestant's vote in Newton Grove	6
Reject the returns from Franklin Township, a majority for contestee of 39	39
Cumberland County:
Reject Cross Creek No. 1, which returned for contestee a majority of 89	89
Reject Cross Creek No. 2, which returned a majority for contestee of 166	166
Reject Cross Creek No. 3, which returned a majority for contestee of 170	170
Reject Cross Creek No. 4, which returned a majority for contestee of 192	192
Reject Eureka, which returned a majority for contestee of 30	30
Total	2,480

Showing a majority for contestant of 574 votes.

The above statement of contestant's contention, as quoted from his brief, shows that in order to support his claim it is necessary to reject the entire vote of Craven County and also of Duplin County.

The first reason given for excluding the entire vote of Craven County is "that the county board of elections of Craven County, in appointing judges of election for the various voting precincts under the law of the State of North Carolina, which provides that each party shall have representation among the said judges, ignored those who had been recommended by the Republican executive committee in all the precincts in said county except Maple, Cypress, Truitts, Dover, Fort Barnwell, Core Creek, Lees Farm, First Ward, and Third Ward."

The vote in these excepted districts, as to which contestant concedes that the judges were properly appointed, was as follows:

	Thomas.	Fowler.
Maple Cypress	61	67
Truitts	154	35
Dover	99	76
Fort Barnwell	117	29
Core Creek	91	19
Lees Farm	59	106
First Ward	133	3
Third Ward	201	22

Thomas over Fowler, 558.

There is evidence that in some or all of the other precincts the election officers were all Democrats, or that if Republicans they were not those recommended by the Republican executive committee. We are not satisfied that the consolidation of some of the other precincts, so as to crowd more Republican and Populist voters into one precinct than could readily vote and be counted in a single day if attempts were made to delay the voting, was done for an honest purpose. But if we were to throw out all of those districts Mr. Thomas would still have a majority in the unattacked districts as above stated, and we have been shown no reason why the vote of the unattacked districts should be rejected. Therefore, notwithstanding the evidence of considerable irregularity in some parts of this county, we are unable to reject the entire vote as requested by contestant.

We are asked to reject the entire vote of Duplin County principally upon the ground that in various precincts there were in the summer of 1900 bodies of men banded together, and known as "Red Shirts," the purpose of whose organization was, by public demonstration with guns and pistols, to terrorize and intimidate Republicans and Populists and prevent them from voting. There is some evidence of such organizations and such conduct at or prior to the August election, at which the proposed new constitution was voted upon and State officers elected, but the evidence is meager as to the extent of such terrorization, and we can hardly find that it extended throughout the entire county, even in August. There is little or no evidence that the terrorization and intimidation in August had any material effect upon the Congressional vote in November.

No evidence has been submitted from which we can compare the vote in Duplin County at the August election with the vote at the November election, but in Craven County, for which we have been given the figures, the total vote for governor in August was 1,843, while the total Congressional vote in November was 3,483. In Duplin County the total vote for Congressman in 1900 was 2,778, which is undoubtedly considerably larger than the total vote at the State election in August, the exact figures for which have not been supplied.

Contestant also complains that in Duplin County the election boards were either composed entirely of Democrats, or where Republicans or Populists were appointed they were not those recommended by the recognized authorities of said respective parties. It does not appear from the evidence that the Republican party submitted any list of those whom it desired placed upon the respective election boards. The Populists did, and asked for the appointment of a Populist on each election board. The county board, however, in some instances appointed Republicans and in others appointed Populists, but not always the persons named by the party authority.

There is evidence tending to show that in some of the districts the so-called Republicans or Populists who were appointed were of doubtful allegiance to the parties they were supposed to represent and sometimes voted mixed tickets, but we have not been pointed to any evidence that they worked or voted against the contestant.

As to some districts no cause has been shown for complaint as to the complexion of the election boards, and upon the whole we are not satisfied that the vote of the entire county can properly be rejected.

There is some evidence of a conspiracy in Craven County to so arrange certain election precincts, and in both Craven and Duplin counties to so constitute election boards as to help the Democratic party and operate to the disadvantage of Populists and Republicans.

In some parts of the district there is evidence of carelessness and irregularity and probable fraud in the conduct of the election and counting and return of the votes. The Republican party, as already stated, had no candidate. There is evidence that some Republicans voted for the contestee, and there is some evidence of Republican dissatisfaction with contestant.

The testimony in this case is voluminous. In its examinations we have not been assisted by the oral argument of counsel, the opportunity afforded by your committee having been declined. The printed brief submitted by contestant's counsel does not, in our judgment, sustain his contention.

Upon the whole case we find that the frauds and irregularities shown are not sufficient to overturn contestee's majority, and we therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolutions, viz:

Resolved, That John E. Fowler was not elected to the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Third Congressional district of the State of North Carolina, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That Charles R. Thomas was elected to the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Third Congressional district of the State of North Carolina, and is entitled to a seat therein.

M. E. OLMSTED, Chairman.
J. M. MILLER.
GEO. SUTHERLAND.
HENRY D. GREEN.
J. M. ROBINSON.
SAM'L L. POWERS.
F. D. CURRIER.
JOHN J. FEELY.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, the Third district of North Carolina is composed of 9 counties. At the Congressional election in 1900 the sitting member, Mr. Thomas, received a plurality of 1,909. His seat was contested by Mr. Fowler, a Populist, who alleged numerous frauds, irregularities, etc., all of which charges the committee has carefully considered.

We find that it would be impossible to unseat the contestee without throwing out the votes of two entire counties. Craven County we are asked to throw out because the members of the election boards were all of one political party. But we find that 8 districts of that county are unattacked. No objection lies to the composition of the election boards in those 8 districts. If we were to throw out the balance of the county, the contestee would still have a majority of 574 in that county in those 8 districts. We see no reasonable ground for throwing out the districts unattacked.

Again, in Duplin County, which we are asked to throw out, there is some evidence of what is called "redshirtism," intimidation, etc., by organized bands of "Red Shirts." The evidence upon that point is very meager, but so far as it goes it shows that the disorder occurred at the August election, at which State officers were elected and a State constitution is said to have been adopted. There is evidence of such an organization in August and of acts done which probably did affect the result of the August election. but the evidence is very meager as to the extent of territory embraced in this Congressional district in which intimidation prevailed even in August, and there is no evidence of such organizations operating at the November election—the Congressional election. As the vote at the November election was nearly double what it was in August, we are unable to find that anything of that sort occurring in August affected materially the November election. The Congressional election held in November, 1900, was not held under the State constitution said to have been adopted in August, and therefore no questions arising under that constitution or concerning the August election are involved in this contest.

There are evidences of some frauds and some irregularities, but granting to the contestant all that he claims in other particulars, we could still not give him a seat without throwing out the entire two counties of Craven and Duplin. He has not shown us sufficient ground for throwing out the whole vote of those two counties and disfranchising voters in those districts against which there is no charge of wrong. We therefore find by unanimous vote of the committee, the report being signed by every member save one, the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], who did not sit, that the contestee, Mr. Thomas, is entitled to his seat. I will yield to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], but unless he desires to say something, I call for a vote upon the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The question was taken, and the resolutions agreed to.

OHIO ELECTION CONTEST—LENTZ V. TOMPKINS.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I call up for present consideration privileged resolution No. 206, in the contested election case of Lentz v. Tompkins, which I will ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That John J. Lentz was not elected a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Twelfth Congressional district of the State of Ohio, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

Resolved, That Emmett Tompkins was elected a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Twelfth Congressional district of the State of Ohio, and is entitled to a seat therein.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, the Twelfth Congressional district of Ohio is composed of the two counties of Fairfield and Franklin, embracing the city of Columbus. The election in that district resulted in giving, as appeared from the returns, a plurality of 18 to the sitting member, the contestee, Mr. Tompkins. At the election the Australian form of ballot was used. The law of Ohio provides that where there is any dispute about a ballot as to how it should be counted the ballot shall be put in an envelope with evidence showing whether or not it was counted, and if counted, for whom. Twenty-five only of such ballots were disputed at this election, at which over 51,000 votes were cast.

The committee has carefully considered those ballots and the laws of Ohio relating thereto, and had no difficulty in arriving at the unanimous conclusion that, counted as they should have been counted, they gave the contestee an addition of 1 vote, making his plurality 19. There are in the notice of contest sweeping charges of bribery. Because particularly of the closeness of the vote in this district we have given to the testimony and to arguments of counsel the most careful and thorough consideration possible. We find that one witness testified that he received $200 for reporting any Republican disaffection. He testified, however, that he did not use that money to secure any Republican vote or any vote against the contestant, but that he himself voted for Mr. Lentz and used part of the money in securing another Democratic vote. Another witness testified that he received $30 to work for Mr. Tompkins and Mr. Wickham, he being a candidate for a local office, but he testified he voted for Mr. Lentz.

Another witness testified that he received $5 for similar purposes, but it does not appear whether he voted for anybody. In addition to those things there is evidence of a club, rejoicing in the classic title of "The Pig's Ankle," composed of ten colored gentlemen, who testified that ordinarily they vote the Republican ticket and were inclined to do so in this election, but that, in the language of one of them, they were "out for the dough." These men testified that one Walter Thomas, commonly called "Plut," who himself testified that he was working in the interest of the contestant, offered them $2 apiece to vote for Lentz. There is, however, no evidence that Mr. Lentz knew of that offer or that any of them voted for Mr. Lentz.

On the other hand, we do not believe that they did. There is some evidence showing that some of them received sums varying from 50 cents to $3, presumably to vote for Mr. Tompkins, but the evidence is of such character that we are almost compelled to throw it out entirely. This same "Plut" Thomas, working for the contestant, procured affidavits from these witnesses, taking them before one of the counsel for the contestant, who was introduced to them under an assumed name and claimed to be Republican, telling them that there were considerable sums of money to be paid that they ought to have received, and if they would make these affidavits and give testimony accordingly they would see that they received compensation.

They made affidavits. It is apparent from their testimony afterwards that they did not know what was in the affidavits. One says that he did not know any more about what was in them "than a hog knows about olives." Upon the witness stand they contradicted their own affidavits and their own testimony. We are of opinion that their testimony, procured by improper means, and in itself contradictory, and in some particulars manifestly untrue, is not worthy of serious consideration. But if we believed it all, it would not change the result. As to at least half of them there is no evidence that they voted at all for anybody. As to others, two or three of them, there is evidence that they voted for Mr. Tompkins, but we are not told in what precincts they voted nor even in what counties, except as we might take judicial knowledge of the fact that the city of Columbus is in a certain county. We could not throw out the precincts in which they voted, as we have not been shown in what precincts they did vote, nor have we been shown the total vote in any precinct. If we were to accept all the evidence as true, in the light most favorable to contestant, we could not do more than throw out the 10 votes, which would still leave the contestee entitled to his seat.

There is no allegation against the integrity of any election officer or any election return. There is no allegation, and much less is there any evidence, of any improper conduct whatever on the part of the contestee. The report of the committee is unanimous. Unless the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ROBINSON], to whom I will yield, desires to make a statement, I will call for a vote upon the resolutions.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not desire to take up the time of the House, but the report of the committee, as unanimously indorsed by all the members of the committee, gives a fair résumé of the evidence. It is brief, and the conclusions of the committee are set forth. So I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the report in this case may be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The report is as follows:

The Committee on Elections No. 2, to which was referred the contested election case of John J. Lentz v. Emmett Tompkins, from the Twelfth Congressional district of the State of Ohio, submit the following report:

The Twelfth Congressional district of Ohio consists of the counties of Fairfield and Franklin. As shown by the official returns, the vote in said district at the Congressional election November 6, 1900, was as follows, viz:

County.	Republican—Emmett Tompkins.	Democrat—John J. Lentz.	Union Reform—George F. Ebner.	Prohibition—John S. Wilkins.	Social Labor—Charles C. Pomeroy.
Fairfield	3,725	5,463	42	79	.....
Franklin	21,980	20,224	114	270	0
Total	25,705	25,687	156	349	0
Plurality	18	.....	.....	.....	.....

Mr. Tompkins, having an apparent plurality of 18, received the official certificate, and in pursuance thereof was sworn as a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress, and holds his seat subject to the result of the pending contest.

The ballot in use in Ohio is of the form known as Australian, and under the laws of that State each ballot about which there is any dispute or question is required to be placed by the election officers in a sealed envelope with evidence showing whether it was counted or not, and, if counted, for whom. It is remarkable that in an election at which 51,903 votes were polled there were only 25 such ballots. Some of them were counted for contestant, some for contestee, some were not counted at all, and as to others there is no evidence showing whether they were counted or not, or if counted, for whom.

Having carefully examined these ballots and the law relating thereto, your committee finds that a proper counting of them shows an increase of one vote in favor of contestee, increasing his plurality to 19.

Contestant, in his notice of contest, makes sweeping charges of bribery, and we have given careful consideration to the testimony upon this branch of the case. The most important and apparently the most reliable witness called testified that he received in all $200 from a person upon whom he called upon the advice of contestant. As a consideration he was to give to the person who paid him the money any information that he could gather "concerning Republicans who were out of the traces," etc. He did not "use a cent of the money * * * in any manner to influence either a Democrat or a Republican or Populist or anybody else to vote against Mr. Lentz." But, on the contrary, voted for Mr. Lentz himself and used part of the money in registering a Democratic vote.

Another witness testified that he received $30 "for work for Tompkins and Wickham" (the latter being a candidate for recorder), but voted for Mr. Lentz. Another received $5 for the same purpose. The evidence shows that he voted, but does not show for whom, nor in what precinct.

We are unable to see that the facts elicited from these witnesses can be given such effect as to reduce contestee's plurality.

The testimony of other witnesses upon the subject of bribery related mainly to an organization of colored men known by the classic title of "The Pig's Ankle." These men, about 10 in number, ordinarily vote the Republican ticket, and were inclined to do so in the Congressional election of 1900, but, in the picturesque vernacular of one of the members, they were "out for the dough." One of them testified that a colored man named Walter (commonly called "Plut") Thomas, whose own testimony shows that he was working for contestant, offered the members of this club $2 each to vote for Mr. Lentz, which offer was refused.

There is no evidence to show that any of them did vote for Mr. Lentz, and no evidence to show that more than half of them voted for Mr. Tompkins. Several of them have given some testimony to the effect that they received sums ranging variously from 50 cents to $3, presumedly to vote for Mr. Tompkins. Several of them made affidavits alleging that they and other persons belonging to the organization had been paid or promised certain sums in consideration of voting for him. In some instances the affidavits were prepared in advance and they were induced to sign them. In other instances they were signed when the affiants were drunk. One of them testified that he knew no more about what was in the affidavit he signed "than a hog does about olives." Upon the witness stand they contradicted, either in whole or in part, the affidavits they had previously made, and in some instances, upon cross-examination, contradicted the statements they had made in direct examination. There is abundant evidence to show that these affidavits and the testimony of these witnesses was procured by the abovementioned "Plut" Thomas upon promise of compensation for their testimony.

The affidavits were apparently secured in advance in the hope that they would assist in holding the witnesses upon the stand to the corroboration of the statements therein contained. Thomas took the witnesses before one of the attorneys of contestant, who was introduced to them under as assumed name. He wrote the affidavits and the several persons signed them with the expectation, as they testified and as Thomas himself admits, that they were to derive pecuniary advantage from so doing. These ex parte affidavits have been submitted to your committee, but are not admissible as evidence. (Foster v. Covode, 2 Bart., 524; Jones v. Mann, 2 Bart., 474; Knox v. Blair, 1 Bart., 536; Wiggington v. Pacheso, 1 Ells., 14; Holmes v. Wilson, 1 Ells., 323; Hill v. Catchings, Rowell, 806.)

The most of the testimony of these witnesses, even upon the witness stand, was hearsay, and as such inadmissible under the common-law rules of evidence, which ought to be, and have been, applied by the House in election cases. (Watley v. Cobb, 53d Cong., Report 267; Arnold v. Lea, C. & H., 602; Ingersoll v. Naylor, 1 Bart., 34; Whyte v. Harris, 1 Bart, 257-267.)

"The vicious tendency of hearsay evidence in election cases needs no demonstration." (Wallace v. McKinley, Mobley, 189; Hurd v. Romeis, Mobley, 425.)

The testimony of these witnesses is so contradictory in character, and they have so manifestly sworn falsely, either in their affidavits or in their testimony upon the stand, or both, that but little credence can be given to any of their statements.

But, in the opinion of your committee, a still stronger and a controlling reason why their testimony must be disregarded is that not only the affidavits, which some of them made, but their testimony upon the witness stand, was procured as a result of bribes, or the offer of bribes, by said Plut Thomas.

But if the ex parte affidavits and the hearsay testimony were all admitted and all the testimony accepted as true according to the construction most favorable to contestant, it could not be found that more than 10 persons had received or been promised, either directly or indirectly, compensation to vote for Mr. Tompkins.

The integrity of the election returns is in no way attacked. No election officer has been proved, or even charged, with any irregularity whatever. No such general bribery in any precinct has been shown as ought to require the entire return to be rejected. But if there had we could not tell what precincts to throw out, as the evidence as to some of the said 10 persons does not show in what precinct or precincts they voted, and as to others does not show that they voted at all. Furthermore, as to some of the 10 who are shown to have voted, it does not appear whether they voted for Tompkins or Lentz.

If we were convinced that any precinct ought to be thrown out entirely we could not say whether to throw it out would benefit the contestant or contestee, as we have not been furnished evidence showing the vote by precincts. We have the vote by counties only. Surely we could not throw out a whole county, even if it were clearly shown that the 10 persons had been bribed and had voted.

The injustice of disfranchising more than 50,000 honest voters will at once appear. There is authority in the minority report in Delano v. Morgan, 2 Bart., 204, written by a former Speaker of the House, that as the law of Ohio provides only for the punishment of persons offering or receiving bribes, but does not declare their votes illegal, therefore they must be counted. But we can not consent to this doctrine, holding, as we do, that to receive and count a vote clearly shown to have been cast as the result of a bribe would be in violation of the spirit, if not the letter, of all laws tending to secure the freedom and purity of the ballot.

If satisfied from the evidence that these ten persons had been paid to vote for contestee and had so voted, your committee would not reject the entire vote of the respective precincts in which they deposited their ballots, even if we knew which precincts they were, or had returns by precincts so that we might act upon them. We would not throw out the entire precinct, but exclude the illegal votes, following Robinson v. Harrison, Fifty-fourth Congress, Report No. 1121; Bowen v. Buchanan, Rowell, 196. But the throwing out of such votes would not change the result of the election.

There is evidence of one John Tincher that he and another person went to the office of the chairman of the State Republican committee, and, giving assumed names and representing themselves to be voters of Westerville, secured orders for railroad tickets to that place and return. They then attempted to secure money, but, failing to do so, did not obtain the railroad tickets and did not go to Westerville. They both voted for Lentz. Their testimony simply discloses an unsuccessful scheme to obtain money fraudulently from the Republican committee.

There is also the testimony of two colored persons, residing near Washington, D. C., that they went to Columbus before election. They could not, upon cross-examination, give the name of any hotel or boarding house at which they had stopped in Columbus nor the name of any person whom they had there met. They aver that they received $25 each for going there and $25 each after they got there. One of them testifies that he was asked to intimidate colored voters from voting against Tompkins by threatening them with social ostracism. The other testifies that he felt that he was also expected to bribe them. They both testify that they promptly and virtuously returned to their homes and performed no service whatever in Columbus.

We are unable to see that the testimony of these witnesses, even if believed, ought to influence the case. But not only is it upon its face of doubtful verity, but there is the fact that one of them, some time before going upon the witness stand, wrote to the contestee a letter from Washington, in which he said:

"I have in my possession information that will send some of Mr. Lentz's friends to prison for intimidation and false swearing. Them people who are in this conspiracy are now in your city trying to do this mean, dirty trick. I know who these people are, and I will put myself at your disposal to show these people up to their face. Please let me hear from you at once. I am in a short ride to Washington, and would be glad to see you and have a talk with you. I await an early reply."

He also wrote a letter of like import to one of the Ohio Senators, who, he assumed, might be interested in the case. Failing to hear from the contestee, they endeavored to help the cause of the contestant.

We find that 1 vote was cast for contestee by a person having no legal residence in the precinct in which he voted.

The statute governing contested Congressional elections provides that the contestant shall, within a specified time, give notice to the member whose seat he designs to contest, "and in such notice shall specify specifically the grounds upon which he relies in the contest." The member whose seat is contested must, "within thirty days after the service thereof, answer such notice admitting or denying the facts alleged therein and state specifically any other grounds upon which he urges the validity of his election." (R. S., secs. 105, 106.)

This notice and answer constitute the pleadings of the case and are intended to present clearly the issue to be determined.

The notice filed by the contestant in this case contains 29 specifications, 18 of which were declared by his counsel to have been abandoned, no testimony whatever having been offered in support of any of them. They embraced charges against persons and matters in no wise connected with the Congressional election. They were evidently not intended to have any bearing upon the contest, but simply to place upon record slurs, insinuations, and direct charges against persons not parties to the proceedings and having no opportunity to defend themselves. The reply of the contestee also contains much that is objectionable and wholly unjustifiable, except as it may be stated to be a reply in kind to the notice of contest. Contestant then filed an additional paper, not authorized by law, containing matter still more scurrilous and abusive. All three of these papers would, if contained in pleadings in any court, be suppressed as scandalous and impertinent.

Your committee has no authority to suppress or alter them, but desires as earnestly as possible to condemn the manifestly improper use of papers which are intended by the act of Congress to be the means of enlightening the committee and the House as to the precise points at issue in the contest by making them vehicles of abuse and vilification of each other by the parties to the contest and particularly of third parties in no way connected therewith.

We have carefully considered all the evidence in the case, as well as the printed arguments and typewritten briefs of counsel, and have listened to oral argument without limitation as to time. Owing to the closeness of the vote in this district, we have given unusual attention to every detail. There is no allegation in the notice of the contestant and not even an insinuation to be found in the testimony that Mr. Tompkins, the contestee, was in any way concerned in any illegal, improper, or even irregular act. As the result of the most careful consideration possible to be given to this case, we conclude that the contestee received a plurality of the legal votes cast, and therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That John J. Lentz was not elected a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Twelfth Congressional district of the State of Ohio, and is not entitled to a seat therein.

"Resolved, That Emmett Tompkins was elected a member of the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Twelfth Congressional district of the State of Ohio, and is entitled to a seat therein."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. OLMSTED, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the report in the case of Fowler and Thomas be printed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the report of the committee in the North Carolina case may be printed in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[The report is printed elsewhere in these proceedings.]

CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE—WALKER V. RHEA, NINTH DISTRICT, VIRGINIA.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, I am directed by Committee on Elections No. 3 to ask consideration of the privileged report of that committee in the case of James A. Walker v. William F. Rhea, the case coming from the Ninth district of Virginia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up the following resolutions, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That James A. Walker was not elected a Representative in the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Ninth district of the State of Virginia.

Resolved, That William F. Rhea was duly elected a Representative in the Fifty-seventh Congress from the Ninth district of the State of Virginia, and is entitled to a seat therein.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. Speaker, the committee in this case had before it a volume of evidence, and many questions were raised; but we deem it entirely unnecessary to go over them, as the report gives a full statement of all the facts in the case. The report is signed by all the members of the committee except one, who was absent, but who assents to the report. I think all that is necessary for me to do at this time is to move the adoption of the report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania submits a privileged report, which will be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That immediately on the adoption of this rule and immediately after the reading of the Journal on each day thereafter until the bill hereinafter mentioned shall have been disposed of, the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of the bill (H. R. 12199) to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, and after due consideration in the Committee of the Whole the same shall be reported to the House with amendments, if any, and become a continuing order until disposed of.

With the following amendment:

In lines 9 and 10 strike out the words "and become a continuing order until disposed of" and insert "this order not to interfere, however, with the consideration of revenue bills, appropriation bills, or conference reports."

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, this resolution simply provides for the consideration of the immigration bill without any limitation as to time of debate or any interference with privileged matters.

Mr. MIERS of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will that interfere with the special order for pension bills on Friday?

Mr. DALZELL. It will not.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I understand that it puts no limitation on the offering of amendments?

Mr. DALZELL. No limitation on debate or amendment.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 12199, the immigration bill, and pending that motion I should like to ask my friends of the committee if we can come to an agreement as to time.

Mr. RUCKER. A number of gentlemen on this side have indicated their desire to speak on this bill, and I should prefer not to make any agreement at this time. Let the debate proceed two or three hours, and then I think we can agree.

Mr. SHATTUC. I accept the proposition of the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not hear one word that was said. The House will please be in order.

Mr. SHATTUC. The gentleman from Missouri suggests that we go on with the debate for three or four hours, and then, perhaps, we may come to an agreement.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BOUTELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of a bill on the Union Calendar, H. R. 12199, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12199) to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill may be dispensed with. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, the bare statement that the number of immigrants received into the United States during the past eighty years equals more than one-quarter of the present population, and that more than one-half (nearly two-thirds) has been received in the last thirty years, presents in a concrete form the magnitude of the immigration problem.

In the years gone by this constant stream of immigrants has been welcomed to our shores, partly as a valuable contribution to the brawn and brain that peopled the prairies of the West and transformed them into the rich and powerful States that delight our pride and strengthen our nation to-day, and partly because a large number of them came to escape wrong, oppression, and human suffering akin to that from which the Pilgrim Fathers fled when they crossed the ocean to found in a new and unknown land a government wherein they could have homes and worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences.

In later years, it has developed, new elements have been purposely injected into the stream which, unless checked, threaten not only to seriously pollute it, but also to thrust upon our nation and the States burdens they should not be called upon to bear.

By reason of this change the feeling of welcome which had hailed the incoming immigrant from 1821 to 1875 changed to one of alarm lest "the unguarded gate" might allow entrance too freely to elements discordant and not easily assimilatod, as well as burdensome and harmful to the best interests of the country.

Hence there has arisen the demand, growing more and more insistent, that restrictive measures should be enacted to regulate the influx and sift the quality of the incoming aliens. This demand has been partly pacified by legislation of a restrictive nature during the past twenty years having the purpose, first, to prevent assisted immigration brought here under contract to perform the labor done by and take the places of workmen already here and employed in mine and field and factory; and, second, to prohibit and prevent the practice of foreign countries making the United States the dumping ground for the pauper, vicious, insane, and criminal classes of other nations.

To meet and check the importation of labor under contract the alien contract-labor law of February 26, 1885, was passed, mainly at the demand of the Knights of Labor, then the most powerful of the national organizations representing the labor of the country.

To correct the other evils realized and complained of various statutes have been enacted during the past thirty years from which results more or less beneficial have been attained.

The report and evidence submitted by a commission appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury June 17, 1891, to investigate into "the causes which operate in the several countries of Europe to incite immigration to this country" named the following as the chief causes promoting said immigration:

1. The efforts of emigration aid societies, supplemented by associations, public and private, for aiding criminals and paupers to emigrate.
2. The increased facilities, speed, and profits of alien steamship and transportation companies, who, through their numerous agents, advertise the marvelous beauty of this country, the high rate of wages that range here for labor, and the alleged quantities of land that can be had gratis from the Government, and thus make an impression on persons who do not own and can not in reason expect to secure the homes in which they live.
3. The contract-labor importers, who induce emigration for the sake of cheap labor.

This report showed that large numbers of homeless children of both sexes below the age of 16 were being shipped to the United States.

It also fully described the methods by which criminal and pauper emigrants were shipped to this country, and gave a list of 69 societies actively engaged in such work.

The findings of the investigation were summarized in the following words:

From the foregoing report it will be seen that there are many persons engaged in the business of transferring from the moribund systems of European misgovernment vast numbers of their dangerous, pauperized, diseased, decrepit, and criminal population, not only as a safety valve to their overstrained machinery, but to serve as an element of weakness in this Republic, the greatness of which they view with growing alarm. Some of these persons are the occupants or the heirs apparent to thrones, officers of charitable societies and boards, and agents of carriers by land and sea, many of the latter subsidized by foreign Governments to monopolize the ocean carrying trade. Others are within the bounds of the United States who distribute the human detritus as contract laborers, imported by them to increase dividends at the expense of wages and the dignity of labor. Still others organize these malcontents into groups to wage war on our system of government, and endeavor to bury popular sovereignty beneath a mass of un-American jargon and bomb-throwing anarchy.

The facts thus reported are amply sustained and corroborated by information gleaned by investigations of Congressional committees, special commissions, etc.

The testimony is overwhelming as to the volume of undesirable immigration even now being admitted. The demand for effective restriction is universal and imperative, and the legislation herewith submitted will be a step in the direction of meeting and correcting the evil.

Brief consideration may be properly given to the course of immigration from 1821 to 1901, as shown by official statistics and records of the Government. Examination will show a fluctuation between wide extremes at different periods.

The tide of immigration may be said to have begun in 1820, when 8,385 immigrants arrived, while by 1830 the number had increased to 23,322, with a total between 1820 and 1830, inclusive, of about 150,000.

From 1831 to 1840 almost exactly 600,000 were received.

From 1841 to 1850 there came 1,713,251.

From 1851 to 1860 the number reached 2,598,214.

In the next decade, in spite of the civil war, 2,314,824 came.

From 1871 to 1880 we received 2,812,191.

From 1881 to 1890 the high-water mark was reached, the total being 5,246,613, the number in one year, 1882, being 788,992.

In the last decade of the century, 1891 to 1900, the number was 3,687,564, while the grand total from 1820 to 1900 was 19,123,596. Add to this the immigration for the fiscal year 1901, which was 487,918, and we have a total of 19,611,514.

It must also be borne in mind that in this computation no account is taken of the cabin-passage immigrants, of whom there came last year alone about 80,000. It would be a conservative estimate to say that for the eighty years covered by the statistics fully 2,500,000 immigrants were of this class.

Nor are there adequate records of the immigration through and from Canada, which, since 1885, would doubtless add many hundreds of thousands, thus giving a grand total not far from 22,500,000.

It is safe to assume that at least 5,000,000 alien immigrants have entered the United States since 1890. We calculate that there has been at least 80,000 cabin passengers annually who were alien immigrants and 70,000 annually from Canada. Neither the cabin passengers nor the Canadian passengers have been taken into our accounts.

The tide ebbed and flowed as the conditions for employment varied in the United States, or as famine or pestilence in foreign lands incited an exodus.

This is clearly shown by the table annexed, wherein is given the influx each year for the entire time named as far as recorded.

Number of alien passengers arrived in the United States, 1820 to 1855, and number of immigrants arrived, 1856 to 1901.

An interesting fact is shown by comparing the immigration with the population.

By this test the maximum was in 1854, when the ratio was 16.2 immigrants to each 1,000 of population, while the average from 1847 to 1854, inclusive, was 13.65 per 1,000.

The ratio ran down rapidly until 1862, when it was 2.7 per 1,000, the lowest ratio from 1839 to 1901.

In the year 1882, when the largest number in the history of the country was received, the number per 1,000 of population was exactly 15, and in 1898, when the lowest number since 1879 came, the ratio was exactly 3 per 1,000.

For the year 1901 the ratio was 6.1 per 1,000.

There has been a marked change in the character of the immigration.

Prior to 1880 western Europe, including England, Scotland, Ireland, Wales, Germany, and the Scandinavian countries, furnished more than three-fourths of the immigration from all countries, while eastern Europe, including Italy, Austria-Hungary, Russia, and Poland, furnished less than 1 per cent thereof.

These comparisons are made with no intent to reflect upon the nationalities named, but merely to show the marked change in the source of immigration during recent years.

One other important fact remains to be mentioned. Prior to 1880 the larger portion of the immigration went inland to the farms and assisted in building up the great States of the West and Northwest.

The immigration since 1880, and especially for the past decade, has remained almost wholly in the Atlantic States and in the cities thereof; and thus, while perhaps not of such vital importance in comparison with the total population of the country, it has brought a heavy pressure of competition upon special localities, thereby giving a spur to the demand for restriction which comes to Congress with such insistence.

The significance of this phase of the question is apparent when it is noted that the census of 1900 shows nearly 40 per cent of the population of the United States living in cities of 4,000 or more population.

According to Dr. True, of the Department of Agriculture—

Between 1870 and 1890, speaking relatively and in round numbers, 2,000,000 men gave up farming and went to join the great army of toilers in our cities. Taking their families into account, 6,000,000 people from the farm were added to the population of the town.

In the single year 1895, as shown by the report of the Commissioner of Labor, of 343,267 immigrants, 224,650 went to New York, Pennsylvania, and Massachusetts, or nearly 70 per cent of the total. That same year 36 per cent of immigrants, including women and children, had no occupation and 42 per cent were farm laborers, laborers, or servants. The percentage of the same classes, respectively, for 1901 were 30.5 per cent and 53.1 per cent.

This tendency of concentration in certain States and in the cities is strikingly shown by the tables given, as follows:

*Estimated for year ending June 30, 1899.

The distribution of the increase of foreign-born population by geographical divisions of the country is shown in compact form by the following table:

Geographical division.	1890-1900.	1880-1890.
The United States	Per cent. 100	Per cent. 100
North Atlantic Division	80.1	41.8
South Atlantic Division	.7	1.3
North Central Division	9	44.5
South Central Division	3.3	1.9
Western Division	6.9	10.5

From this table of percentages it appears that of the total increase in foreign born from 1880 to 1890, 44.5 per cent was in the North Central Division, whereas for the decade ending in 1900 only 9 per cent of the increase is found to be in the North Central Division as compared with 80.1 per cent in the North Atlantic Division.

This concentration in the latter division of four-fifths of the increase of the foreign-born element since 1890 is due to a very decided change in the character of the immigration in recent years, a change which began to be apparent in 1890, but which has progressed since at a very rapid rate.

Even up to 1890 the natives of Germany, Ireland, Great Britain, Canada and Newfoundland, Norway, Sweden, and Denmark practically dominated the immigration to this country, these five classes combined having contributed nearly 13,000,000 (12,853,828) out of a total of 15,427,657 immigrants to June 30, 1890.

From 1891 to 1900, however, they have contributed, out of a total of 3,687,564 immigrants, only 1,539,926, or a little more than two-fifths, as against three-fourths for the ten-year period ending in 1890, more than four-fifths for that ending in 1880, and fully nine-tenths for those ending in 1870 and 1860, respectively.

While the 161 principal cities of the country contained more than one-fourth, or 25.9 per cent of the total population in 1900, they had very nearly one-half, or 49.2 per cent, of all the foreign born.

The proportion of foreign born in the principal cities is nearly three times the proportion found in the remainder of the country outside of these cities, comparison being with the total population in both cases.

The North Atlantic Division contained 70 of the principal cities in 1900, with 48 per cent of the total population in the division, while the foreign-born population represented 64.7 per cent of the foreign born in the division. The proportion of foreign born to total population in the cities of the division is also very large, being 30.5 per cent, or practically twice the proportion (15.4) shown for the remainder of the division.

The 12 principal cities in the State of New York contain more than three-fifths of the total population of the State and fully four-fifths of its foreign-born population.

The principal cities of Massachusetts and Rhode Island represent very nearly as large a proportion of the total population, or 58.4 per cent and 56.7 per cent, respectively, but the cities of Massachusetts contain two-thirds of its foreign element, while those in Rhode Island contain only three-fifths of all the foreign born in that State.

New Hampshire has 42.6 per cent of its foreign born in cities, compared with 34.6 per cent for Massachusetts, 34.1 per cent for New York, and 33.5 per cent for Rhode Island.

The proposed law now under discussion does not afford adequate protection in the matter of closing the Canadian frontier against the entrance that way into the United States of prohibited alien immigrants and others. This immigration comes in two classes—first, those manifested to Canadian ports from Europe, but destined for the United States, and second, those manifested from European ports to interior places in Canada, but intending secretly to cross the border and enter the United States contrary to law.

The first come openly, because they would have little difficulty of entrance at our own ports. The second come that way because, in proportion as inspection and enforcement of the laws become effective at United States ports they are driven to seek that means of evasion.

Even with the first class the inspection is lax, because upon foreign soil there is no authority to deport therefrom. With the second class the United States authorities are practically defenseless, since the immigrant is ostensibly destined to Canada and not to the United States.

Having landed in Canada, there is no authority to inspect, as the immigrant is manifested to a Canadian interior point. If he subsequently sneaks across the border and is arrested by the United States commissioner, he can not be deported through Canada, for lack of legal authority. It is abundantly proved that the greater part of the infirm people who come to us, the aliens who drift into our institutions, come by way of Canada.

Indeed, immigrants rejected at American ports have been subsequently found in New York City, Philadelphia, Baltimore, etc., having returned to this country through the Canadian loophole.

Whatever inspection there is in Canada or at European ports exists by the sufferance of the steamship companies, and has no legal binding force.

It has proved an entire failure and even a disadvantage in the enforcement of the immigration laws.

The immigration laws of this country are flagrantly violated. These Canadian steamship agencies in Europe do not hesitate to advertise openly and guarantee to their passengers (the good, bad, and indifferent ones) that they shall be safely delivered into the United States and no questions asked if they will only take passage via Canada. I have their bills so advertising.

I will read for the benefit of the House a letter I received March 14, this year, from the Secretary of the Treasury on this matter. It is self-explanatory.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 13, 1902.

Hon. W. B. SHATTUC,
Chairman Committee on Immigration and Naturalization,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: As it is understood that your committee has under consideration various measures with relation to the immigration of aliens into the United States, I have the honor to inclose herewith for your information copy of a letter from the United States Commissioner of Immigration at St. John, New Brunswick, together with a circular setting forth the agreement referred to therein, from which you will see some of the difficulties, from an administrative point of view, in enforcing the existing immigration laws as to aliens coming through foreign contiguous territory.

Very truly, yours,
L. M. SHAW,
Secretary of the Treasury.

And now I will read the letter referred to by the Secretary of the Treasury:

No. 1276.] TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF UNITED STATES COMMISSIONER OF IMMIGRATION,
St. John, New Brunswick, March 11, 1902.

COMMISSIONER-GENERAL OF IMMIGRATION,
Washington, D. C.

SIR: I have the honor to report the following facts in connection with the difficulties experienced here and at Halifax in having excluded immigrants deported:

On February 24 the steamship Tunisian arrived at Halifax, bringing, among others, three Finlanders who were suffering with trachoma and who were excluded. Marias Anderson, a Dane, also came on this vessel and was allowed to proceed to this port, where he was examined by Dr. Heiser, who stated that Anderson was suffering with lupus of the skin, whereupon he was excluded as likely to become a public charge and ordered deported.

Last Monday, upon arrival of the steamship Tunisian at Halifax on her outward trip, we had these three Finlanders locked up in a room of the immigration building and requested the company's agent to carry out the order of deportation. He said that under instructions from Messrs H. & A. Allan he could only ask the immigrants if they were willing to return, and if they were, to inform them that the company would return them free of charge; if not, that the company could not and would not force them to be deported.

As soon as Anderson was excluded at this port the company was served with an order of deportation, but it appears that they never made any attempt to detain him here, and he was allowed by them to go at his pleasure and has disappeared.

The Allan Company persistently insists that under the present agreement they are not compelled to use force in deporting excluded immigrants, and that their whole duty is performed when they tell the immigrant that if he desires to return they will take him back free, but that nobody can compel him to return.

This scene has been enacted here and at Halifax time and again, and especially with Allan Line passengers.

When the steamship Lake Superior arrived here on February 24 I had the doctor examine the passengers at the gang plank before leaving the vessel, and the objectionable ones were not permitted to land, but were locked up and kept on board until the vessel sailed for Liverpool, on the 1st instant. In this manner we were able to deport the eight immigrants pronounced objectionable by the doctor, but since then it has been stated in the public press that the * * * Immigration Society have engaged counsel and that if anyone is held on board the vessel and not permitted to land a suit will be instituted to compel the steamship company to release them and permit them to land.

However, it is my intention to have the passengers examined by the doctor on board again on the arrival of the steamship Lake Ontario, due about the 13th or 14th instant.

Notwithstanding this, I desire to invite attention of the Department to the fact that it is absolutely impossible to secure any deportations at the hands of the Allen Line unless the immigrant is willing to return, which condition is of course ridiculous to consider, as no immigrant will voluntarily consent to deportation.

The Elder-Dempster Company claim that when the passengers are once landed they can not use force to get them back on board, as there is no authority for doing so in the Canadian law.

These facts are furnished for the information of the Department, and it is requested that instructions be given as to the proper course to pursue relative to excluded immigrants when the company refuses to force them to return, as this office has noted under the supposition that section 3 of the present agreement contemplated that the "steamship company bringing such aliens shall be required to return them to the countries from which they respectively came."

Respectfully, JOHN THOMAS, Commissioner.

There is no doubt at all that these immigrants are by this time across the border into the United States; and this is no isolated case. Had these immigrants been posted on the other side of the ocean they would have purchased their steamer tickets only to some Canadian place, and then they would not have been inspected by our people at all. Our representatives are permitted to inspect only such immigrants as are named in the manifest which is furnished by the steamer (a list of the names of those coming to this country). Yet this very steamship company which refused to deport these rejected immigrants has a paid representative in this city for the purpose of influencing legislation so it may continue to dump at our borders the scum and refuse of Europe and Asia.

It is a fact that most of the steamship companies delivering passengers at New York, Philadelphia, etc., are doing all they can do to keep immigrants likely to be denied entrance into the United States from securing passage on their boats, while these Canadian lines solicit the undesirable and vicious to be taken, with a view of entrance to this country. This is not all. It can be proven that one of the Canadian railways is in the Chinese passenger traffic regularly, and is assisting the smugglers by stopping its passenger trains several miles outside of a certain city and discharging the Chinese in the country, where wagons, built especially for the purpose, take whole gangs over the border under cover of the night, and in this way thousands of Chinese enter the United States annually.

And how natural it is that these Canadian railways and the steamship lines doing business to and via Canada, as well as the very few American railways interested in this Canadian business, should select as their representative the same gentleman who represents the American Asiatic Association before the House and Senate committees in trying to secure by law what notoriously is done in the face of the law—free entrance of the Chinese to this country without restraint. It appears to be a consolidation of all the interests antagonistic to our laws and to the manifest wishes of the American people.

If the Immigration Restriction League of Boston, Mass., which is working hard to secure the passage of a law which will require every alien immigrant coming into this country to be able to read, would lend its aid in securing legislation which will close the "unguarded gates" on the Canadian frontier against the free and easy entrance to this country from Europe of alien immigrants who are idiots, insane persons, paupers, persons likely to become a public charge, persons afflicted with a loathsome or with a dangerous contagious disease, persons who have been convicted of a felony or other crime, polygamists, anarchists, prostitutes, or persons who have been induced to come to the United States by promises of securing work, then I am sure this House would be more likely to agree to legislation for a still further restrictive feature of our immigration laws which could and would be enforced in New York and elsewhere. But it is useless and foolish to further add restrictive measures to our immigration laws until this Government is enabled to enforce its present laws at the Canadian frontier.

I am well aware that the representatives of the transportation lines which are benefited by this "unguarded gate" (the Canadian frontier) assert that the number of those entering the United States via Canada is greatly overestimated.

The answer to that statement is that there is no record at all as to how many come in illegally by that route.

As many may come in as desire to come in, for there is little, if anything, to prevent them from so doing. The very best evidence that there are very many persons coming that way is that the transportation managers interested are violently opposed to any change in the laws which will close the Canadian "unguarded gate" or interfere with the present state of affairs.

If this business is of no value, if there are very few immigrants coming into the United States that way, why is it that the representatives of these corporations should become excited when new legislation is proposed, legislation which will change even in a very minor way the present status as to that business? A personal experience of over thirty years with these transportation gentlemen and their representatives justifies me in asserting that not one of them ever becomes alarmed without just cause; and, besides, they would not object to any new legislation unless they were injured by it, and they could not be injured unless the corporations they represent who are now doing a profitable illegitimate business, were to lose that business. Legislation will follow shortly with a view of controlling the Canadian frontier. It will then be interesting to see just how many gentlemen who are now enthusiastic on the subject of the educational test as it would apply at ports of the United States will vote against closing the Canadian frontier.

Voting to close the ports of the United States against the entrance to this country of good, strong, honest, healthy young men and women because they can not read a few words in any language and then refusing to vote to effectually close the Canadian frontier against the entrance into this country of criminals, prostitutes, anarchists, insane, and persons sure to become a public charge, will constitute a record such as few men would care to make.

This open discrimination in favor of Canadian steamship companies and Canadian railroads as against our own railroads and steamers landing at our shores should not longer be permitted. That the managers of our own corporations complain is but natural; that the managers of the Canadian corporations and the managers of the American railroads affiliated with them are perfectly satisfied is the best evidence obtainable that a great wrong is permitted to exist.

What little is being accomplished by this Government in controlling the immigration coming via Canada is dependent entirely upon the good faith and by the permission of the officers of the Canadian steamship companies and officers of the Canadian railroads. This country should not depend upon any corporation either at home or elsewhere for the execution of its immigrant laws, for it is no secret that the railroad and steamship companies do not always keep their promises when entered into between themselves.

Attention is also called to the migratory character of immigration from Canada itself, by which is meant mainly the French-Canadian element engaged largely in lumbering and in the mills and factories of New England.

It is estimated that this migratory immigration from Canada to New England points is not far from 70,000 annually.

Perhaps 10 per cent of it remains and by intermarriage forms part of the permanent population.

The remaining migrationists are birds of passage, coming and going with the seasons, and filling the places in mill and factory from which they have ousted their English and Irish predecessors.

There seems to be no good reason why immigration across the Canadian border should not be subject to inspection, record, and restriction just as rigid as that enforced at ports of entry along the seacoast of the United States. It is manifestly unwise to leave unguarded a wide-open back door through which undesirable immigration, excluded elsewhere, finds easy entrance, thus nullifying the restrictive laws of our own country and exposing us to all the evils we wish to prevent.

The amendments to the law herewith suggested will, if adopted, go a long way toward reaching these evils and preventing such thwarting of our laws.

The designation of exclusive ports of entry along our boundary lines through which alone aliens may be admitted may prove effective, especially if the Government is given authority to employ an adequate police force of inspectors to guard the frontier, as well as to deport all who should enter at other than said designated ports of entry.

The expense of this service would be charged to the immigration fund and the per capita tax collected would much more than pay the expense of the service. It is estimated that there are many thousands who come via Canada annually who pay no head tax at all. It is shown that many aliens debarred from entrance at United States ports come into this country via Canada after having been refused admission at ports of the United States.

With almost unanimous voice the labor interests of the country have asked from Congress legislation for further and more effective restriction of immigration.

Nor is the demand confined to this one division of the people. It is sustained by the press, urged by economists and publicists, and indorsed by the platforms of the political parties.

Opinions differ as to specific methods to be applied, some asking measures more drastic than others, but all unite upon the need of immediate action that shall at least perfect the present laws and regulations and make them more effective for the purposes intended.

The concentration of such a large portion of the total immigration, and of almost all the undesirable immigration, in a comparatively few localities causes an immediate competition in the labor market, from which has sprung the insistent demand for restriction.

The testimony of all representatives of labor is uniformly in favor therefore, as stated, of further and more effective restriction, however much they may differ as to the method best for immediate trial.

It is alleged that immigration causes an oversupply of labor and displaces higher standards of living; that labor fails to get the share of general prosperity otherwise obtainable, because a constantly increasing supply of workmen makes demands for increase in wages in times of prosperity ineffective, and that while this competition is felt less in times of business activity it will act with crushing force if a period of depression should come.

Thus two powerful forces, immigration and machinery, operate jointly to prevent a rise in wages and a consequent increase in the consuming power of labor. The kind of immigration received during the last decade recruits the ranks of the unskilled, from which is constantly drawn the supply to supplant higher-priced labor in the skilled trades. Machinery makes it possible to subdivide processes of labor and use women and children in place of men formerly employed.

Organized labor understands this and therefore stands as a unit in demands upon Congress for further restriction.

Statistics show that immigration ebbs and flows with the movement of wages in this country.

In 1882 immigration reached 788,992, and fell to 334,203 in 1886.

In 1892 it rose to 579,663, and fell to 229,299 in 1897, the lowest number since 1864.

During 1901 (including cabin passage immigration) it rose to over 560,000.

Could accurate figures be given for the influx across the Canadian border, undoubtedly at least another hundred thousand would be added to this last total.

While labor representatives urge more effective restriction because of this competition for employment and consequent effect upon increase and even maintenance of present rates of wages, economists also urge it upon the ground of the deleterious effect upon the standard of living and civilization.

Investigation proves conclusively that in general wages in the United States are very much higher than in European countries, ranging from 50 per cent to 500 per cent.

It is generally claimed by immigrants that their wages in American cities are from four to five times as high in money as the wages in the rural districts whence they came.

By the reverse of this proposition, the immigrant in his native country was compelled to exist on an income only 20 to 25 per cent of that received by American labor,

Hence, what the standard of the American mode of living requires and the wages demanded to secure it seem paradise and princely compensation to the new arrival.

The effect of this displacement of labor by immigrants is strikingly shown by the following extract from the report of the Industrial Commission recently submitted to Congress:

> There is another effect introduced by immigration different from that which would proceed from a natural increase in population. This is the unequal distribution of immigrants in the several occupations and localities. From unskilled and unorganized occupations and from the Canadian border come more urgent complaints of the depressing effect of foreign-born competition than from elsewhere. Certain unions, such as glass blowers, charge an initiation fee higher for aliens than for citizens. This and various other reasons have caused the immigrants to crowd with concentrated effect upon the unprotected occupations, like those of common labor, coal mining, clothing and textile manufactures. In these trades there has been overcrowding and displacement of native workmen or of earlier immigrants and reduction of wages without directly depressing wages in other employments.
> The displaced classes take two different courses. Some of them fall in the moral scale and increase the number of hoodlums and tramps. Others seek other occupations or become the foremen or employers of immigrants where a higher standard can be maintained. It may be said on this account that the fate of the displaced classes turns upon the general prosperity of the country, since in time of prosperity the upward transition is comparatively easy and in times of depression exceedingly difficult. But at this point it should be noted that the method by which the original American stock or the earlier immigrants are able to rise above the new immigrants who displace them is in itself open to objection. It consists in that restriction of numbers, through late marriages and smaller families, by which the pressure of competition is lessened.
> In this way the original stock and the earlier immigrant stock from western Europe, though rising in scale, becomes less productive and proportionately smaller as the years go by. For this reason it was contended by the late Francis Walker, Superintendent of the Ninth and Tenth Censuses, that from the time when immigration first assumed large proportions it has amounted not to a reinforcement of our population, but to a replacement of native by foreign stock.

Economists claim that when once labor-saving machinery is introduced and unskilled men can do the work formerly requiring skilled workmen it is largely the immigrant who receives the employment, and the former workman must accept less wages by reason of the competition or seek other employment, only to meet, in all probability, similar conditions therein.

By this means, it is further claimed, the displacement named results in the introduction of continuous successions of lower and lower standards of living, as in the cotton textile industry, wherein the native educated American has been displaced successively by the English, the Irish, the French-Canadian, the Armenian, and the Syrian.

It is noticeable that where women have entered factory production they are usually the wives and daughters of immigrants.

Taking in view all these facts and factors, the inquiry is pertinent, shall the standard of citizenship and living in the United States be permanently depressed or shall rigorous methods be adopted to more carefully sift the immigration coming to our shores?

Could some means be devised whereby the stream of immigration would flow to the farm instead of to the factory, much of the burden and danger would be removed.

Unfortunately, as has been shown, the same powerful inducement that draws the farmer's son to the city acts with tenfold force upon the immigrant, whose controlling impulse is, first, immediate employment as near as possible to Ellis Island, and, second, the largest return possible for his toil.

Both these can best be got in the city, and to the city he gravitates.

If employment is immediately obtained, he becomes, in a measure, self-supporting.

The statistics of the various States present some startling revelations concerning the great burden placed by immigration upon the penal and charitable institutions of this country, the larger percentage of the inmates of jails, insane asylums, and charitable institutions having been furnished by the immigration, and investigation has proved the existence of organized effort in foreign countries to unload upon the United States their pauper, insane, and criminal classes.

It is evident from what has been stated that legislation proposed must be carefully considered and be along conservative lines.

While no undesirable immigrant should be admitted, room may be found for immigration such as from 1860 to 1880 contributed so largely to the growth and development of our country.

Existing laws are weak in many points and silent on others where restriction can be strengthened, and there are many loopholes for evasion.

There has been no codification of the various laws affecting immigration enacted during the past twenty-five years.

Even without suggesting new legislation, it is apparent that great improvement would result if the laws can be so compiled as to remove inconsistencies, ambiguities, and conflicts of authority now existing.

Legal interpretation of existing laws has hampered administration by close construction in some instances, making proof of violation difficult and inflicting unnecessary hardships in enforcement.

Tickets are furnished usually upon correspondence from immigrants already here, describing their own success in finding employment and good wages and the demand for labor.

Then, again, migration is no longer promoted by corporations employing labor, but by importing agencies of the several races.

They have branches in their own country and in America, and thus furnish labor to employers upon order, their long experience teaching them the loopholes in the law and the surest manner of evasion.

The immigrants are collected in squads, forwarded to ports of deportation, and coached effectively in the answers to be given to the American inspectors.

At the same time wholesale bargains and understandings are made with the steamship companies for their transportation.

Upon landing they are met by American agents whom they have means of recognizing.

In due time they are turned over to the employing contractors.

It will be seen how difficult it is to prove a contract under such conditions, and a contract, within the meaning of court interpretation, does not exist.

To meet this difficulty changes are made in the law, so as to more clearly define what shall be construed as a contract.

In framing this law it is believed that due regard has been had for all the interests involved. Undue injury to labor by ruinous competition with imported contract labor will be made more difficult while at the same time avoiding measures so drastic as to cripple American industry, agriculture, and the great shipping and transportation interests.

If the suggested law proves effective within its intended scope and in its administrative features, it can be made the basis of such additions hereafter as public sentiment may warrant or future conditions demand. While special interests may ask for more radical action at the present time, that course is best for all which is the safest and which conserves the interests of our whole country.

Having, by the bill proposed, established a harmonious code for the enforcement and administration of restriction as a general principle, it will be easy and appropriate from time to time to add supplementary features as necessity requires.

A summary of the more important changes, additions, and improvements embodied in this new bill may be appropriately given here.

The principal object of the bill is to codify in concise form all the legislation of this character heretofore enacted from the act of March 3, 1875, to the act of 1894, and to arrange the legislation in regular order and sequence according to the various specific subjects dealt with in the bill.

It is the object also of the bill to eliminate from the laws concerning immigration all those parts which have become obsolete as a result of subsequent legislation and to amend all portions of the laws which have been found inadequate to accomplish the plain purpose intended by them because of judicial decisions and interpretations and because of lack of authority for their administration.

The bill further embraces legislation which seemed to be demanded by enlightened public opinion, besides necessary enactments to cover the recent territorial acquisitions of the United States in the Philippines, Porto Rico, Hawaii, etc.

The bill increases the amount of the head tax on aliens coming into the United States by land transportation as well as by water from $1 to $1.50. The increase is justified by the greater cost of administering the law, which proposes to deal in a more effective way with the dangers of an already large and rapidly growing alien population, not only by rejecting at our ports before landing those who are found to be inadmissible, but by following up those who have effected an entrance and afterwards become criminal or pauper burdens upon the local municipalities, and within three years after their arrival returning them to their own countries.

The head tax, by the way, is also required to be paid by aliens coming into the United States across the land boundaries, and the proposed law imposes a penalty for the nonpayment of the same.

The present bill consolidates with the general immigration laws existing legislation with regard to the importation of aliens under contract to perform labor in the United States, thus making the money from the head tax available for funds in payment of expenses for the enforcement of those laws instead of securing the necessary funds for the purpose through a special annual appropriation.

The proposed law excludes from admission to the United States, or any place subject to the jurisdiction thereof, the following classes of alien immigrants: All idiots, insane persons, epileptics, and persons who have been insane within five years previous; persons who have had two or more attacks of insanity at any time previously; paupers; persons likely to become a public charge; persons afflicted with a loathsome or with a dangerous contagious disease; persons who have been convicted of a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude; polygamists; anarchists or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of all government or of all forms of law or the assassination of public officials; prostitutes, and persons who procure or attempt to bring in prostitutes or women for the purpose of prostitution; persons whose migration to the United States has been induced by offers, solicitations, promises or agreements, parol or special, express or implied, of labor or work or service of any kind in the United States, and also any person whose ticket or passage is paid for with the money of another, or who is assisted by others to come, unless it is affirmatively and satisfactorily shown that such person does not belong to one of the foregoing excluded classes. Persons living in the United States are not prevented from sending for a relative or friend who is not of these classes mentioned, nor are persons convicted of a purely political offense excluded. It is also provided that skilled labor may be imported if labor of like kind unemployed can not be found within the United States. Professional actors, artists, etc., are not excluded.

The new law in relation to the insane was introduced in this bill to relieve our State and municipal institutions from the burdens they have been made to bear by these immigrants obtaining admission to them and remaining there indefinitely. The provisions concerning anarchists were adopted upon the theory that an effective way to deal with this evil was by refusing admission to the United States to the teachers and disciples of such a system or belief.

The part of the bill in relation to prostitutes and procurers is to complete the evident purpose of the act of March 3, 1875, which makes the importation of such aliens a felony, but omits to provide for rejection at ports of the United States.

The wisdom of the proposed law in regard to contract alien labor can not be questioned. It is for the protection of the American workingman. He deserves all that we can legally do for him, and no law which will keep alien contract labor out of competition with him can be too strict. The old law is strengthened in this respect by dropping the word "contract" and inserting in its place the words "offer, solicitation, promise."

This change has been made to meet the rulings of the courts, which held that in every case of alleged violation of the law the elements of a binding contract must be proven to bring offenders within the meaning of the act. Now, the "contract" does not have to be proved under the proposed bill, only the "offer, solicitation, or promise."

Certain rulings of courts have destroyed the value of the act as far as its protection was concerned, because under such rulings aliens could be imported with impunity upon the suggestion or assurance that employment awaited them in this country. Besides, Congress has already recognized, in section 3 of the act of March 3, 1891, the necessity of broadening the language of the act so as to cover the evil, for in this measure referred to it makes a violation of the law the migration of any alien to the United States in consequence of an advertisement in any foreign country promising work in this country. Therefore throughout the bill the words "offer, solicitation, promise" are used in lieu of the word "contract," as at present.

In this connection, what was considered by the committee as a necessary exception was embodied in this act. It provides that where skilled labor of the kind desired can not be found unemployed in this country, then, under such circumstances, skilled labor may be imported. The practicability and propriety of this is obvious. The imported alien contract laborer injures the American workman only by displacing him. If labor of the kind desired can not be found in this country and is imported, no one is displaced.

Another change in this bill is in the substitution of the word "attempt" for "aid," the courts having in effect held that the word "aid" involved the actual landing of the prohibited aliens. Of course, when a steamship company willfully tried to land such class of aliens and the inspectors discovered they were illegally here, then they were immediately rejected and (technically) not allowed to land. Therefore the steamship companies could not be held liable, because they had not aided the alien to land in view of the fact that he had not landed at all. Hence the word "attempt," so as to cover even the effort of the company to land such a person, whether he is rejected by the inspector or not.

What is considered a fair and equitable provision is also included, which provides that if an alien immigrant who is really not entitled under the law to enter this country should be admitted by the immigrant inspector, and is afterwards found to be here unlawfully, the fact that the inspector admitted him relieves the steamship company of the penalty of a fine of not more than $1,000 provided for attempting to land such aliens, but does not relieve the steamship company from taking such alien back at the expense of the company if found here within one year after his arrival. Many safeguards are thrown around the actions of inspectors under the proposed law, and it will be very difficult for an immigrant who should not be admitted to get through safely.

The provision also covers those immigrants who secure entrance into the country without inspection. The bill further provides that any alien contract laborer, rejected as such, may be detained, if such detention is necessary, to be used as a witness in behalf of the Government in any suit which may be brought against the person or persons inducing his unlawful immigration to the United States, the expense of such detention to be paid by the immigrant fund. The necessity for this legislation is due to the fact that the immediate return of such alien robs the Government in many cases of the sole witness it has to successfully maintain an action against a contractor.

The present bill makes it unlawful for any transportation company or vessel to bring to any port of the United States any alien afflicted with a loathsome or dangerous contagious disease.

The company which brings such alien under this bill is subject to a fine of $100 for each alien so brought if the Secretary of the Treasury is satisfied that the disease existed at the time of foreign embarkation and that its existence then could have been discovered. To enable the collection of such fine the law prohibits the issuance of clearance papers to any vessel which has incurred such fine or refused or neglected to pay it, and it furthermore provides that such fine shall not be remitted. As before stated the deportation of any such alien is provided for. This new legislation, by punishing the taking on board ship, will, it is believed, abate the evil under discussion, for the owners of vessels will avoid the payment of any such fine by a more careful examination at the port of embarkation. The exclusion, at the port of departure, of all diseased persons will prevent the thousands of passengers on board ship en route to this country from becoming inoculated with any disease which would not manifest itself until days after such passengers had become distributed throughout the country. It is not at all unjust to the owners, for they can easily protect themselves by careful examination before embarkation of aliens and by the refusal of passage to those so afflicted.

Another feature provides for the return, with any rejected alien who is helpless from infancy or physical inability, of any person who has accompanied such helpless alien to this country.

A most important part of the system of supervision of immigration in this country is the examination at the port of arrival by physicians. Provision is therefore made in the bill for thoroughly competent physicians who are qualified within all reasonable limits for this particular work.

The time within which an alien who has become a public charge may be deported is extended by the bill from one to three years. The reason for this extension of time is found in the frequent complaints of communities charged with the burden of maintaining helpless aliens, such complaints being supported by an array of figures which leave no room for doubt that the extension of time is imperative. It is a fact that many aliens of this particular class have come here, remained the one year formerly prescribed, and then, safe from deportation, entered the charitable institution in the community in which they then happened to be, to remain there permanently a public charge and burden upon that community.

The old laws make a distinction between those aliens who become public charges from causes existing previous to their landing here and those who become so from causes arising after such landing. The new bill is the same in this respect. It provides that any alien who shall become a public charge from causes existing prior to landing shall be deported to the country whence he came at any time within one year after his arrival at the expense of the steamship company bringing such alien here, and to this is added in the proposed law one-half the cost of inland transportation to the port of deportation.

Formerly the steamship company was merely required to take the alien back on its ship. The added penalty of one-half the inland transportation (which is to be paid by the steamship companies) will no doubt increase the vigilance of the companies and cause them to refuse passage to persons of this character from the other side. It is not a severe penalty, but since it involves some actual outlay it should be more effective than the mere return of such alien on ships regularly plying to foreign ports; which return is made at an inappreciable cost.

Under the proposed bill it is provided that an alien who has become a public charge from causes existing before he landed may be deported within three years after the first year after arrival, the immigrant fund paying the cost of his ocean transportation to the country whence he came, and the corporation or municipality relieved of such burden paying the expense of delivering such alien at the port of deportation, including inland transportation, care, etc.

Under the proposed law those aliens who become public charges from causes arising after landing may be deported if found here within three years after arrival in the same way, the immigrant fund paying the cost of ocean travel and the corporation or municipality paying the expense of delivering the alien at the port of departure.

In order to keep track of them in our institutions the proposed law improves the system whereby undesirable aliens may be traced, and this information will be carefully taken and preserved. Heretofore these immigrants have been lost sight of and have actually filled many of our institutions. Careful periodical inspection of all these institutions is to be made also with this end in view. What is generally considered one of the best features of the proposed law in this connection is the requirement that the passenger manifests of vessels carrying immigrants shall be full, detailed, and explicit in all data that may serve in personal identification.

The Secretary of the Treasury is given power to arrest and deport aliens found to be unlawfully in the United States and their return is required by the transportation lines bringing them here, to the country whence they came, or if that can not be done, as in the case of tramp steamers, then at the expense of the immigration fund. The time within which such arrest may be made is extended to three years, to correspond with the parts of the proposed bill just above referred to.

The foregoing comprises briefly all the proposed legislation that is essentially new in this act, that is, all that is not already on the statute books, and the entire codification is really and simply a fuller application of the principle of existing laws. Of this there is certainly much need, and the committee believe such changes and improvements to be necessary and imperative.

Mr. Chairman, I am very sure there is not a gentleman in this House who will not heartily and fully approve of the purposes of this bill. We may differ, and properly so, as to the methods of securing desired results, but I am sure there will be no objection to the general object of the bill. Little, if any, legislation would be enacted if every one of the 356 members was to have every bill in all respects to his liking. Legislation is largely a matter of compromise, as every well-informed person understands.

Few bills have been more carefully considered by a committee than has this measure, and it was at its final hearing unanimously agreed to by the committee (of 11 members). The bill meets the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, who has charge of the Department which will administer it, and it may be added that the bill is substantially in accord with the conclusions of a conference of experts in the employ of the United States Industrial Commission, some of the greatest alienists in the country, the Commissioner-General of Immigration, and the commissioners of immigration at the ports of New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and San Francisco. It may be said, therefore, to embody the best expert suggestions obtainable, and that it contains the best of what such a law ought to contain in order to give a conservative yet effective instrument for the exclusion or regulation of undersirable immigrants.

Consider and analyze carefully the statistics given in this table. These figures speak volumes. They are correct so far as they go. There is not included in these statements the number of immigrants who illegally come into the United States by the Canadian frontier. It is claimed by perfectly competent authority that the number who have been debarred at our ports, together with the number who avoided our ports of entry altogether and who sneaked in by the Canadian frontier, is many times the number of the debarred who are recorded in this report. [Prolonged applause.]

Mr. OLMSTED. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question before he sits down.

Mr. SHATTUC. I yield for a question.

Mr. OLMSTED. Or rather a suggestion. It seems to me that without amendment the bill that your committee has reported will not read as you had intended. I understand this tax of $1.50 per person is to be paid by the vessel or the passenger?

Mr. SHATTUC. There is an amendment to be offered there.

Mr. OLMSTED. It reads to be paid by the—master, agent, owner, or consignee of every such vessel, or by the alien passenger, if such passenger comes overland within twenty-four hours after the arrival of such vessel in port.

What vessels come overland?

Mr. SHATTUC. If you will wait until the amendment is reported you will find that it is straightened out.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SHATTUC. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I would like to ask the gentleman whether this bill restricts immigration?

Mr. SHATTUC. Not to any greater extent than before, but we have anarchists in there, and the insane and lepers, and I think that is about all.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The argument made by the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. SHATTUC. I thought the gentleman was asking me a question.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am coming to my question now, if you will permit me. I will not take up your time. The argument of the gentleman from Ohio was to the effect that immigration was injurious——

Mr. SHATTUC. I beg your pardon. I call the gentleman to order. I yielded for a question. That is not a question.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If the gentleman will not permit me to put the question in my way, I shall not ask a question.

Mr. SHATTUC. Under the five-minute rule you can ask it, but not now.

Mr. CLARK. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SHATTUC. I yield to the gentleman for a question.

Mr. CLARK. That is what I am trying to get at. Is this bill substantially the same bill that Cleveland vetoed or not?

Mr. SHATTUC. Not at all. Mr. Cleveland vetoed the educational test.

Mr. CLARK. Has this any educational test?

Mr. SHATTUC. It has not; and I hope it will not have when it goes through the House.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman a further question.

The CHAIRMAN. To whom does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHATTUC. I yield to my friend from Mississippi.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. I want to know if any agreement has been made about the length of general debate?

Mr. SHATTUC. Not yet.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi. Could not an agreement be made?

Mr. SHATTUC. We did not try very hard.

Mr. OLMSTED. I want to ask whether this bill has a provision that relates in any way to the coming of persons into our home ports from our insular possessions?

Mr. SHATTUC. It has.

Mr. OLMSTED. That is covered by the bill?
Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman——
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Indiana?
Mr. SHATTUC. I do.
Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I see that by a section of the bill that it provides "United States" shall be construed to mean territories over which the United States has jurisdiction. What is the operation of the law, first, with reference to Hawaii?
Mr. SHATTUC. It takes in Hawaii.
Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. With reference to the immigration from the Territory of Hawaii how would it apply?
Mr. SHATTUC. I would like to call upon some of the great lawyers upon the committee to state that.
Mr. KLEBERG. It would apply.
Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Would it apply to immigration to the Philippine Islands?
Mr. SHATTUC. Not from the United States.
Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. From other countries?
Mr. SHATTUC. It applies to all other countries equally and to all of our new possessions equally.
Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then under it you can not either receive Japanese or Chinese in the Philippine Islands?
Mr. SHATTUC. No.
Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The provision excludes them as it would from the United States.
Mr. SHATTUC. Certainly.
Mr. MANN. Is there anything in this bill with reference to the Japanese or Chinese?
Mr. SHATTUC. I have not agreed to yield to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Chairman. Have you read the bill?
Mr. MANN. I have not, or I should not have asked.
Mr. SHATTUC. You have not asked me to yield. [Laughter.]
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Illinois for a question?
Mr. SHATTUC. With pleasure. [Laughter.]
Mr. MANN. May I ask if the gentleman has read the bill? [Laughter.]
Mr. SHATTUC. Have I read it? I reserve the balance of my time. [Laughter.]
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has seventeen minutes remaining.
Mr. WATSON. With the permission of the gentleman, I would like to ask him a question.
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Indiana?
Mr. SHATTUC. For a question.
Mr. WATSON. Do I understand that by a provision of your bill you strengthen the existing laws?
Mr. SHATTUC. That is the simple purpose of the bill—only.
Mr. WATSON. And by its terms and provisions do you exclude any persons not now excluded?
Mr. SHATTUC. Yes—no nationality, no—but we exclude those who come here insane and those who are anarchists.
Mr. LANDIS. Paupers.
Mr. SHATTUC. No; they are already excluded, and epileptics.
Mr. WATSON. Do you exclude persons coming across the Canadian border that are not now excluded?
Mr. SHATTUC. The theory of the committee is that we ought not to take up the question of the Canadian border and we ought not to take up the educational test, nor should we take up the question of selling liquor on the Government reserves in this bill, but that we ought to get some good legislation and put it on our statute books and then take up these several meritorious measures by themselves.
The fact is that we have not been able so far to get any good immigration legislation because there are three or four different classes of people here in this House who are not satisfied to have some good, first-class legislation passed, but they want better legislation, and they want to tack onto the bill the educational test if they can, and others will tack on, if they can, the question of the Canadian border, and that is the worst trouble we have to deal with. Then, too, our good prohibition friends want to tack on the liquor question, and so the bill gets loaded up and is defeated. I hope that this bill will receive the support of all of our good friends, those who desire the educational test, those who want no liquor sold anywhere within a thousand miles of any place where the Government owns land, and those who want nobody to come over the Canadian frontier. The committee considered all of those questions, and has reported this bill with the hope of getting something done in the House.
Mr. WATSON. I understood a good portion of the gentleman's argument to be directed to excluding people from coming over the Canadian border who now come.
Mr. SHATTUC. Oh, no; because we do not want to endanger the passage of this bill.
Mr. WATSON. Then, I understand that that was just a general observation.
Mr. SHATTUC. Yes.
Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Missouri?
Mr. SHATTUC. Yes; for a question.
Mr. BARTHOLDT. This bill, of course, excludes anarchists?
Mr. SHATTUC. Yes.
Mr. BARTHOLDT. I should like to have the gentleman state what machinery is provided for the identification of anarchists?
Mr. SHATTUC. The same machinery that is used when they try to find out whether a woman is a bad woman or not. They ask her.
Mr. BARTHOLDT. All the means, then, at their disposal is to ask questions?
Mr. SHATTUC. Yes; as to whether or not the man is an anarchist.
Mr. BARTHOLDT. Does the gentleman think a man will admit that he is an anarchist when he is asked the question?
Mr. SHATTUC. Yes; lots of them do.
Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is there nothing more to prevent his coming?
Mr. SHATTUC. We can get a great deal of information from our consuls and our diplomats and our agents whom we send abroad.
Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is it not possible that if some one intends to keep a man out of this country, all he would have to do under the provisions of this bill would be to write to the immigration authorities in New York and denounce the man as an anarchist? I will state that in my judgment a single postal card or a single letter would be sufficient to keep a man out of this country.
Mr. SHATTUC. Well, now, is that a question?
Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is a question which I ask you.
Mr. SHATTUC. Well, I will say to the gentleman that the bill will not let one more come in than could come in otherwise. It is our disposition to keep them out. We keep out a great many other people where we have no greater facility for finding out their objectionable qualifications under the law than we have with the anarchists. I will state to the gentleman that he need not worry about the anarchists.
Mr. POWERS of Maine. Does not this bill prevent people from coming into the United States from the Republic of Cuba?
Mr. SHATTUC. Yes; it does now.
Mr. POWERS of Maine. Why should we admit people from the Republic of Mexico and not from the Republic of Cuba, for which we wish to do so much?
Mr. SHATTUC. Well, because in Mexico they are right along our borders and they can step right over.
Mr. POWERS of Maine. Oh, no; but they may come from some portion of Canada.
Mr. SHATTUC. One is practicable and the other is not.
Mr. POWERS of Maine. This applies to those coming by vessel, as I understand it, from Mexico and the Dominion of Canada. Now, from a large portion of the maritime provinces immigrants come by vessel.
Mr. SHATTUC. Yes; but about 70,000 come across on foot right up in your country, where we are trying to stop it.
Mr. POWERS of Maine. I want to know why we should exclude people from the Republic of Cuba and admit them from the Republic of Mexico?
Mr. SHATTUC. Because it is not contiguous territory.
Mr. POWERS of Maine. It does not seem to me that that is a very satisfactory answer.
Mr. SHATTUC. Well, I know; but it is to the committee. [Laughter.] Now, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time and yield the floor to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER].

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GRAFF having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, who informed the House of Representatives that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:
On May 19, 1902:
H. R. 53. An act for the protection of cities and towns in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes; and
H. R. 13076. An act to apportion the term of office of Senators elected at the first general election in the Territory of Hawaii.
On May 20, 1902:
H. R. 13288. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River in Marion County, Tenn.

IMMIGRATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. RUCKER. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, some months ago the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] introduced a bill in this House that has not been yet reported from the committee in favor of an educational test for immigration. After consulting with Mr. WATSON, and with his permission, before commencing my remarks, I desire to offer that bill substantially as an amendment to the pending bill, and have it pending at this time. I send it to the Clerk's desk to have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that at this time it will not be in order as an amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I ask to have it read to go in the RECORD, and I will offer it at the proper time when the paragraph is reached.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill by adding as a new section, between lines 14 and 15, on page 4, the following:

"SEC. 3. That in addition to the persons excluded under the foregoing section, admission into the United States shall be denied to all persons over 15 years of age and physically capable of reading who can not read the English language or some other language; but an admissible immigrant or a person now in or hereafter admitted to this country may bring in or send for his wife, his children under 18 years of age, and his parents or grandparents over 50 years of age, if they are otherwise admissible, whether they are so able to read or not.

"That for the purpose of testing the ability of the immigrant to read the inspection officers shall be furnished with copies of the Constitution of the United States, printed on uniform pasteboard slips, each containing not less than 20 nor more than 25 words of said Constitution printed in the various languages of the immigrants in double small pica type. Each immigrant may designate the language in which he prefers the test shall be made, and shall be required to read the words printed on a slip in such language. No two immigrants listed on the same manifest shall be tested with the same slip. An immigrant failing to read as above provided shall not be admitted, but shall be returned to the country from which he came at the expense of the steamship or railroad company which brought him."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, there are many people in the United States who believe that there are some restrictions on immigration into this country intended to prevent our receiving any but the better class of immigrants from an intellectual standpoint; but the bill that is now reported by the committee and now before the House is practically a compilation of the old statutes on the question of immigration, with some few changes. There is nothing in it as it stands without the amendment I have offered that restricts immigration, except as to criminal classes and as to pauper classes and certain restrictions in regard to contract labor. The policy of the country has been heretofore simply to say that the deaf and dumb, the blind, the idiotic, the insane, or pauper and criminal classes shall not have entrance into this country; then stop and admit all other classes of immigrants without restriction. In other words, we have not heretofore attempted to say that we will only bring in competition with the standard of American life, the standard of American wage-earners, the standard of American principles and ideas, people from other countries who are qualified and fit to maintain and uphold that standard. We have left our gates open to receive all that come, whether they uplift us or whether, through ignorance or racial tendencies, their admission will result in pulling down our civilization, the standard of American life, and the standard of American wage-earners.

I say the time has come in this country when the duty that the American Congress owes to the American people is far greater to protect the American laborer against the pauper labor of Europe than it is to protect the American laborer against the pauper-made goods of Europe. The first is far more dangerous to his welfare and well being than the latter.

You may say that this country is over 100 years old, that we have passed through four generations since the birth of our Republic and that no such innovation as this has been necessary heretofore; that it is laying down a new rule, but I say to you that the time has come in the history of this country when a new rule should be laid down; that to leave the gates of our country open to any class of people who want to come here in the future endangers our civilization, and the hour has come when we should call a halt and only admit as citizens of this country those people who are capable of understanding our form of government and maintaining the high position of the American citizen and wage-earner.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes; if it is only a question.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The gentleman said the evil of immigration was greater than the danger of free trade.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, my friend wants to be facetious, and I do not care to yield for that purpose.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. No; I am very serious.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I stated that I believed the competition of the pauper labor of Europe coming into our country was more dangerous to the wage-earner than the pauper-made goods coming from Europe.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes; that is the proposition. As to that I would like to ask the gentleman whether it is not true that the men who come here for the purpose of working on American soil are not consumers of our goods, the same as they are producers, and if it is not more beneficial for the country to have them here in this country as consumers than to allow them to remain in Europe and be consumers over there, and then bring their productions to this country under free-trade regulations?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am not going into a tariff argument; that has nothing to do with this bill. I merely mean this: I read in the papers not long ago where a certain number of immigrants landed in this country without money, without property, with nobody to give them employment, and they were driven from the refuse dumps in New York, where they were sleeping and eating the refuse of that great city because they had no place to go. These men, if brought here and allowed to remain here, must come eventually into competition with the great American wage-earner of this country; and I say he is entitled to be free from competition from such a source. That is my position.

Now, why should we make this change? Why, the reason is evident. In the beginning of our Government we had vast prairies and forests to the west of us. The great Western reserve was unsettled. There were miles and miles and hundreds of miles of fertile soil there waiting for the woodman's axe and the farmer's plow. We had no steamship companies in those days to hunt among the slums of Europe and gather anyone that had money enough to pay a fare and bring them here for profit.

The immigrant from whom you and I and most of the great American people are descended came from the north of Europe. He was not brought here by anyone else, but he came here to better his condition. He had to save the money at home to buy his own passage. He came here with the courage and nerve to go into an unknown and an untried wilderness and build a great republic. We were glad to welcome that kind of immigrants; and they were the only ones that came in that day. They were the men of brawn and sinew. They are the men who have left their mark on the American Republic. They were a different class of men from the class gathered to-day and dumped here by the millions in the great cities of this country, not for the purpose of developing it, but with the effect (I do not say for the purpose) of dragging down our own standards here at home.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman permit another question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Does my friend think the educational test is a cure for the evil that he speaks of?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I will come to that in a moment. I ask my friend to wait. I am coming to that.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is it not true that the man who comes here——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, I ask my friend not to inject an argument into my speech. I have been willing to yield to him for a question. I say I am coming to the discussion of the educational test a little later. If the gentleman desires then to interrupt me for a question, I will yield; but not now. I have not reached that point in my remarks.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes, you have. You made a statement that such a man——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I must decline to yield. I have tried to treat the gentleman from Missouri with courtesy; but if he will not accept it in the spirit in which I offer it, I must simply refuse to yield.

Now, Mr. Chairman, between the years 1790 and 1830, when the foundation stones of this Republic were laid, there were only a few hundred thousand immigrants coming into this country; yet the nation of itself developed in those years from 4,000,000 to 13,000,000 of people. What did that demonstrate? It demonstrated that the reproductive powers of our own people, the opportunities for growth, the opportunities for the development of our own people, responded to the needs of the country, and the body of American citizenship developed along natural channels. But if you intend to stifle the people of our own country by making the struggle and the battle for life harder by bringing the pauper labor of Europe here in competition with them, you are of necessity, as all history points, going to cut off the growth of the American citizen himself; you are going to crowd out the people who have built the country; you are going to pull down the standard of living thereby, and you are going to undertake the task of assimilating a class of people that may endanger your republican institutions.

In the beginning of the century we had full opportunity to take care of all the immigrants that came to this country. The homestead laws between 1860 and 1880 allowed immigrants to come to this country and buy small homesteads at $1.25 an acre, and build their homes there and develop the country. The result is, as we find from the statistics, that between 1860 and 1880, when the great West was developing, there were 5,100,000 immigrants landed in this country. Most of them went to the West to build their homes and make their living. What has been the result? The great West was practically developed by 1880, but in the twenty years succeeding—from 1880 to 1900—we find that 9,100,000 immigrants have come to this country. And where have they settled? Not in the great West. Most of them have crowded the already overcrowded cities of the North. Notwithstanding our country had been filled up in the West, the opportunities for free homesteads practically gone, the steamship lines continued to foster the business of bringing immigrants to this country. Naturally these companies selected as the field from which to draw these immigrants portions of Europe where they could be obtained most readily, and that was where the people were most dissatisfied with the conditions that confronted them. So that instead of the high class of immigrants that we had up to 1880, the character of our immigration has been gradually growing lower and lower, until to-day it is a threat to the American Republic.

There is another reason why the immigrants that we had in the beginning do not come now, and why the poorer classes of immigrants are coming to this country. In the first two decades that I spoke of after the civil war, agricultural prices were at their highest point. There was full opportunity and inviting opportunity for the best classes of the farming population of Europe to come here as immigrants and make a good living. Since that time there has been a gradual fall in agricultural prices. To-day agriculture is more profitable than it was a few years ago; nevertheless, it has had a downward tendency for many years, and the better classes of European immigrants have not found the field inviting.

The object of bringing this immense number of immigrants to this country now is to supply the demands for labor. But even to-day, when the demand for labor is at its height, the field for employment is overcrowded in almost all the cities and manufacturing districts. There is no place for this surplus of laboring population to go except to the farms; and we know that there is very little of homestead land left to absorb this supply.

As I said, in the beginning of the century the immigrants who came here depended upon their own energy, thrift, and pluck to fight their own way. The class of immigrants who are coming here to-day depend alone on the agents of the steamship companies to bring them and depend on any opportunity at any price to make a living after they come here. Now, what is the difference in the class of immigrants we then received and receive now? I wish to call the attention of the House to the difference in the class of immigrants who have come into the country.

In the first place, in the early part of the century almost the entire immigration into this country came from Great Britain and Ireland, Germany, Sweden, Norway, France, and northern Europe. To-day we are receiving the larger portion of our immigration from Austria-Hungary, Italy, Poland, and Russia.

In 1869 the immigrants from the latter countries equaled only about one one-hundredth of the number that we received from the United Kingdom, France, Germany, and Scandinavia. In 1880 the immigration from eastern Europe amounted to about one-tenth of the number coming from northern Europe. In 1894 it nearly equaled the number coming from northern Europe, and in 1901 it was three times as great as the immigration coming from northern Europe. In other words, the immigration from northern and western Europe in 1899 amounted to 130,000 immigrants, or 41 per cent of the total, and from eastern Europe 175,000 immigrants, or 56 per cent.

The next year the immigrants from northern and western Europe amounted to 149,000, or 33 per cent of the total, and from eastern Europe 276,000, or 61 per cent. The next year, 1901, the immigration from western Europe amounted to 164,000, or 33 per cent, and the immigration from eastern Europe amounted to 309,000, or 62 per cent.

Of these—that is, of those coming in from eastern and southern Europe—the larger percentage were as follows: In the year 1900, southern Italians, 115,000; Poles, 43,000; Slovacs, 29,000. So, of the immigrants that came in in that year, you can see that the greater proportion were from southern and eastern Europe.

Now, to determine what class of immigrants we want, we all know that it is much more difficult for us to assimilate the Slovac and the Pole and the Italian from southern Europe than it is to assimilate and build up the country with the Irishman, the Englishman, the German, or the Frenchman, people of our own blood and our own kin.

Mr. WACHTER. I should like to ask the gentleman whether it is not a fact that the larger part of these immigrants of the class the gentleman has just mentioned remain in the cities instead of going to the rural districts?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I stated that a few minutes ago. That is a fact. Now, Mr. Chairman, as to which of these immigrants are best for our country is a question about which we can have no doubt here. We know that when the German, the Scotchman, the Irishman, the Englishman, or the Frenchman comes here he builds a home, he develops the country, he adds to our prosperity; but we know that when the Slovak or the Pole or the Italian from Southern Italy comes here he stays in the larger cities. He does not build a home and he does not develop our country. He is difficult of assimilation.

I have some figures here showing the amounts of money that each of these classes of immigrants brought here in the year 1900, as showing the different kinds of immigrants coming to the country. I find that the average Scotchman immigrating to this country in that year had $41; the Englishman had $38; the Frenchman, $37; the German, $28, and so on. But the average Slovak who came into this country that year had $11; the Pole had $9; the Italian from southern Europe had $8. That shows the distinction in the classes coming in that year.

But the question then is whether an educational test will in any way affect this question. You say, if this class of immigrants are undesirable, why should you apply the educational test to keep them out. You may say that education is no test of intelligence. I grant it. A man may have the highest natural intelligence and yet be unable to read and write because he has not had the opportunity to learn. I grant you that an education is merely a tool that can be used successfully in the hands of an intelligent man; but I do say that an intelligent man will seek education, and the fact that a man has education implies that he has intelligence.

Well, how would an educational test affect the citizens of this country? What effect would it have on the class of immigrants now coming in? I find that in 1890 the percentage of illiteracy of the total immigration over 15 years was 20 per cent; in 1896 it was 29 per cent; in 1897 it was 23 per cent; in 1898, 23 per cent; in 1899, 19 per cent; in 1900, 24 per cent; in 1901, 27 per cent. So that as shown in these figures the illiteracy among the immigrants that come into this country is constantly increasing. I have shown that in the figures I have already read that in these years the number of immigrants coming from northern Europe has greatly diminished, and the number coming from southern and eastern Europe has largely increased, keeping pace with the illiteracy that is shown.

I also find that the number of persons in each hundred immigrants, over 14 years of age, who can not read or can not read and write their own language, from those races which contributed 2,000 immigrants to the United States during the years 1899, 1900, 1901 are as follows. I will merely read the difference for the year 1901 and insert the balance in the RECORD. There was eight-tenths of 1 per cent among the Scandinavians who could not read; among the English, 1.8 per cent; Scotch, 1.2; Irish, 3.2; among the French, 3.9; among the Germans, 4.1.

Now, coming down to the races that come from southern Europe and eastern Europe, where the greater proportion of our immigrants are coming from to-day, I find that among the Hebrews there were 23 per cent who could not read and write; among the Greeks, 25 per cent; the Slovaks, 30 per cent; Polish, 37 per cent; Slavonians, 39 per cent; Ruthenians, 53 per cent; Italians from southern Italy, 59 per cent, and Portuguese, 63 per cent. In other words, the illiteracy shown by the immigrants coming from northern Europe for the year was only 5.6 per cent—a little over five men out of every hundred men who landed from northern Europe were unable to read or write—but when you come to the immigration from southern and eastern Europe we find that there was an average of 43.2. In other words, that of the lower class of immigrants that are now coming into this country by the hordes, the greater proportion are immigrants coming from eastern and southern Europe, 43 per cent of whom can not read and write; and if you add to them the other races that are coming in, which are the Japanese and Chinese and Assyrians, you make it 50 per cent of these races that come into this country who can not read and write as against 5.6 per cent from northwest and western Europe.

Those who come here are entitled to all the benefits of our laws, all the benefits of our country. Are we doing the southern Italians, Slovaks, and Poles any good by bringing more from their country, in their present condition, to compete with them and fight in our cities for their daily bread? I say not. I say that those who are already here can not complain against our discriminating against the further importation of that class of labor. But when you come to the men from whom you and I are descended, whether they came yesterday or a hundred or two hundred years ago—I mean the Englishman, the Welshman, the Irishman, the Scotchman, the Frenchman, the German, the men from northern Europe, the men whose blood we bear, whether they are citizens of to-day or descendants of citizens of a hundred years ago—can you say that they will complain against a test that excludes as immigrants from their countries only five men out of every hundred men that come here?

Can any man say that the great German citizenship of this country, that citizenship that has lent its aid so greatly to build up the Republic, to develop our broad acres, to build its homes, that they will complain against a test that only excludes from coming here four men in every hundred that wish to come to this country, and yet protect them from the competition of the Slovaks, the Polish, and the Hungarians, of which 50 per cent who come here can not read or write? I say no. I say that the great German citizenship of this country love their adopted country. They love the American flag and love the American standard of living. They love American protection to the wage-earner in this country too well to fight a law which will protect them and their country from indiscriminate immigration, because forsooth four out of every hundred citizens who seek to come here from Germany are stopped at the gates.

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I would like to ask if he has looked at the statistics on this point? The gentleman has referred to the fact that in the neighborhood of 50 per cent of the Italians when they come here can not read or write, and about the same per cent of Poles and Russians. Now, I would like to ask if he has looked at all to the figures and statistics to ascertain whether or not these people who come to the United States from southern and eastern Europe avail themselves, after they have settled in this country, of our institutions, our public schools, to the end that their children may become educated.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend that I have not searched the statistics as to how many immigrants of that class go to American schools, or avail themselves of that opportunity in this country, but from my general knowledge I know that that class of immigrants come here in such a destitute condition both as to money and native ability to earn a living and to lift themselves up toward the American standard, that I presume their children have but little opportunity to take the advantages of education. In other words, I know from general observation that since this class of immigrants have lately been coming to this country the sweat houses in the great cities have been heard of, and the degrading situation that we find and read about in the papers as to the way the immigrants to this country are being herded and driven along as though they were cattle.

You never hear of the better classes of immigrants coming from northern Europe being herded and driven about as are these poor people coming from southern Europe, where they have been held down and oppressed by poverty and hard living for hundreds of years, for centuries back, and have become so degraded that they are unable to lift themselves up to the high plane of American citizenship. They are descendants of dying races. They have not got the blood that is in the veins of the immigrants of northern Europe, that is reaching out and developing and extending and upbuilding our great Republic. They are like the Egyptians of old that at one time stood proud possessors of the highest civilization of the world, but to-day we find them mere hewers of wood and drawers of water, and unable to rise above that condition. Their course has run, their destiny is complete.

Mr. WATSON. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. On the very question asked by the gentleman from New York there is an interview in the Washington Post of this morning. There is a great deal of testimony on that proposition, but this is valuable, coming as it does from the president of the University of Prague, a member of the Austrian Reichsrath, who gives his observations on this country. He says that the greatest peril to our institutions is immigration; and on the very proposition that the gentleman has asked about, he says:

> Go to New York and you find them fairly swarming about the streets of the East Side from early morning until late in the evening. Then go to the other section of the city and you notice the contrast. In the one place thousands of ignorant children playing in the filth of the smaller streets and alleys, and in the other neatly clad children with school books in their arms.
> It is safe to say that the condition in the former case, under the present circumstances, when no care is manifested for the welfare of the offspring of the foreigners, will not naturally become alleviated in less than the third to the fifth generation.
> There is only one remedy that I can think of, and that is to organize a movement to take care of these children, educate them, and by so doing elevate their moral condition.

That is in answer to the question put by the gentleman from New York whether or not the children of these immigrants take advantage of the public schools.

Mr. RAY of New York. If the gentleman from Alabama will permit me, I did not care to interrupt him and he went right on. I have made a careful study of that question, and my study has run through some years, for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not these people from south and eastern Europe avail themselves or show a disposition to avail themselves of our institutions and our free schools after arriving in this country. I came to the conclusion that they not only do not do it, but do not care to do it.

In New York, where we are experimenting with the compulsory-education law, we find it very difficult to enforce that law against the children of that class of people, whereas with the other classes—the Irish, the Scandinavian, the English, the Scotch, the French, and German—we have no trouble at all; however ignorant their parents are when they come to this country, they are ready, anxious, and willing to embrace the opportunities for education afforded by our common schools.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that the amendment that has been read, and which will be offered by me when the bill is read under the five-minute rule, providing for the educational qualification for immigrants merely provides that an immigrant wishing to enter this country must be able, either in the English language or his own language, to read some clause of the Constitution of the United States, but his children under the age of 18 years, or his wife, or his parents, or grandparents over the age of 50 years can be admitted with him or sent for by him without being able to read, so that there will be no separation of families and no hardships established. There might be other tests, there might be other ways of lessening the immigration into this country. It has been suggested by some that we adopt a consular service examination, but if we do that it requires a good deal of machinery, and, besides, it is very expensive to the Government. The consul, before the immigrants leave their country, must pass upon whether he is a suitable person, and one consul may have one idea in reference to some class of immigrants, and another may have another judgment in reference to another class. There would be no uniformity of system, and in the end, when the immigrant lands at Ellis Island, New York, or the port of entry, he would have to be met with another examination and possibly sent back.

I do not say that this educational test is a perfect test. It is not perfect by any means. But I do say that, as shown by the statistics I have read, it will stop the immigration of over 50 per cent of the immigrants that we do not want, and it will stop the immigration of only 4 per cent of that class that we do want.

Now, if we can adopt a system which, although not perfect, costs the Government nothing, a system that will never turn back the immigrant after he lands on our shores (because under the amendment I offer the steamship companies are responsible for his return passage if he can not pass the test, and they will apply the test before he gets here), why is not such a system desirable? It puts us to no expense—it turns back no man—it does not separate the members of a family, yet it excludes 50 per cent and more of the undesirable immigrants that are coming into this country to-day. I say that under these circumstances, even if this system is not perfect—if it is not all that we might desire—if in some instances it may work disadvantageously to a small extent, it will certainly work greatly to the advantage of our country in other respects, and I say that the wise thing for us to do at this time is to adopt this test so far as it goes.

More than that, a man who, coming to this country, does not understand our institutions, our theory of government, our mode of living is a menace to the American Republic, because after he is here a very short time—in some of the States only a year—as soon as he declares his intention to become a citizen of the United States you put into his hands the most sacred power of government; you enshrine him in the highest office of the world; you give him the power of an elector of the American Republic. Now, while you and I and our constituency are fighting a battle for good government in this country, can we properly say that when so many as 9,000,000 immigrants are coming here in the space of twenty years, and the number is increasing every year, it is fair to them, it is fair to ourselves, to let this condition go on without attempting to restrict this immigration in some way?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I observe that among the classes of aliens included in section 2 are all persons convicted of crime. Does the gentleman know of any provision of law by which that clause of the bill could be enforced?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to my friend from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] that I am not discussing the general provisions of the bill. I am not on the Immigration Committee. I have offered as a separate section an amendment proposing to apply the educational test, and that is the proposition I am discussing.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I thought the gentleman from Alabama was a member of the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. No, sir; I do not know whether there is adequate machinery for carrying out that provision of the bill; but I do know that in this amendment there is a provision for enforcing this educational test. And as I was saying a moment ago, if we are going to admit this class of immigrants into this country in competition with the American wage-earner of to-day, giving them the ballot, and thereby the right to govern this country as well as ourselves, is it not fair and just to our own people, the people who make up the great mass of American citizens, to say that when those men come here they must be provided with enough education to read the Constitution of the United States and to acquire some intelligent idea of our form of government.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman yield now for a question?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will; but I hope the gentleman will not introduce anything in the way of argument. For a question, I cheerfully yield.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I will move to have the gentleman's time extended.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Very well.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If a man coming from any country of Europe has not had the opportunity of education, but is otherwise acceptable as a citizen—if he comes here with two strong arms and a healthy mind and a willingness to identify himself with our institutions, and if under your educational test that man is excluded, is it not true that we punish lack of opportunity; and is such a thing in harmony with true Americanism?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will answer my friend so far as I am able. As I said some time ago, I do not believe that education is a test of intelligence. I admit, for instance, that there might come from the great Empire of Germany many men or some men as immigrants into our country who would be unable to read, and yet with intelligent and healthy minds and healthy bodies, and able to bring themselves up to the American standard of living and American citizenship. On the other hand, as I said a while ago, when a man can not read or write the presumption is that he has not the intelligence to bring himself up to that standard; yet an intelligent man will seek the opportunity of education, and he does not have to go very far in the line of education to be able to read the Constitution of the United States, which is the only test we prescribe here. But I do say that you can not write any law upon the statute books—none has ever been written—that may not produce a hardship in some cases.

Hard cases often make bad laws, but you can not legislate justly for the whole people by bringing down your standard of legislation to take care of the hard cases. You must fix your standard at the top. You must fix your standard where it is just and right to the great body of the people you are legislating for, and then if some unfortunate falls below the standard, why it is his misfortune. It does not make the law unjust. I will say to my friend from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] that he looks at it from the standard of the immigrant who is coming here. He looks at it from the standpoint of the man who seeks to come here and find an asylum.

I will say that I would be very glad for the great American Republic to open its arms to the distressed of all the world if we could do so without danger to ourselves, but I think our first duty is to our citizens at home and our next duty may be to citizens of other countries whom we are willing to welcome and to uplift in the standards of our civilization, but when our own people are threatened by indiscriminate immigration into this country, the hour has come when we must first be just to them, and the only way to be just to them is in some way to prescribe limitations on the importation into this country of all classes of immigration from Europe, regardless of what may be the effect on us. In the decades to come we have got to assimilate these people. Their blood will be joined with our blood; and if they are not up to the standard of the rest that are already here, they will pull us down toward their standard.

Mr. SNOOK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. SNOOK. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] asked the gentleman from Alabama the question whether or not he thinks an immigrant should be barred from coming to this country because he could not read and write if he intends to become a citizen of the United States. I will ask the gentleman from Alabama if he has carried his investigation far enough to know what percentage of these people of whom he has been talking, who come to this country from southern Europe, come here with the intention of making their home in this country and what percentage come here with the intention of acquiring a few hundred dollars and then going back to Italy or to the different countries there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say that I have been unable to find any satisfactory figures on that, because under the loose laws in many States, where they allow a man to take out his papers of intention and then vote, after he has been here a year, it is usual for that class of immigrants to do so, which raises the presumption that they are going to stay here. But I do know from my own experience and what investigation I have made, although I say it has not been satisfactory, that the greater portion of the people who return to their former homes are from those countries of eastern and southern Europe, and that it is very rare that you find an immigrant coming from northern Europe who does not settle here permanently, raise his children here, and become a permanent American citizen.

Mr. SNOOK. Then it is true that a very large percentage of these people from southern Europe do come to acquire a few hundred dollars and then go back?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I know a great many of them go back.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Do I understand the gentleman from Alabama to say that the large proportion of Italians, Bohemians, and Polanders return to their former homes?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I did not state that. I said I did not know what percentage did, but I knew the percentage was much larger among those coming from southern and eastern Europe than those coming from northern Europe.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman permit me to say that from personal knowledge in my own city, Chicago, there is an extremely small percentage of those people who return, and I think a smaller percentage even than those who come from the northern countries?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I have not found that from my own observation or from my investigation of the question, but as I stated to the gentleman from Ohio, I have not been able to find satisfactory statistics, and therefore did not assert it, but from my own observation and what I have been able to gather on the question, my information is that the percentage of those from southern Europe and eastern Europe who return is far greater than those who come from northern Europe.

Mr. RYAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to interrupt the gentleman a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. RYAN. I will state that the statement made by the gentleman from Illinois is also true of my section. Very few of those people return. We have more than 60,000 Polanders in Buffalo and they make good citizens and come here with the intention of remaining.

Mr. WACHTER. I will say the same condition exists in Baltimore. They live so well here after they come that they want to stay here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, Mr. Chairman, I am perfectly willing for all my friends from the large cities to clear their consciences and put themselves on record. [Laughter.] If there is any other gentleman from a large city who desires to do so I will give him the opportunity.

This is a fight for home and country; for the peace, contentment, and prosperity of our own people, for the protection of the American wage-earner and the maintenance of our civilization.

I hope the amendment will be adopted, and I feel sure that it will meet with the approval of all classes of our citizens, whether native or foreign born, who love their country and who desire peace and prosperity at home.

APPENDIX.

GENERAL FIGURES AS TO TOTAL IMMIGRATION.

1. Immigration by decades, 1821 to 1900.

Letter of Mr. Gompers in reference to an educational test.

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., May 16, 1902.

Hon. JAMES E. WATSON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I have observed with much pleasure your activity in the cause of the regulation of immigration, and in particular your introduction of a bill providing that no adult immigrant shall be admitted to our country till he has acquired the first rudiments of education. It is for this reason that I now address you with regard to pending and prospective legislation.

The organized workers of the country feel that the existing immigration laws, while not without their value, are of trifling effect compared with the needs and the just demands of American labor.

The elaborate bill reported to the House by the Committee on Immigration is for the most part a simple codification of the existing laws, and modifies them only in some few details. I believe that the changes proposed are for the most part desirable. They are, however, comparatively unimportant. If it is worth while to take up the question of immigration at all, it is worth while to introduce a genuine and effective regulation.

The strength of this country is in the intelligence and prosperity of our working people. But both the intelligence and the prosperity of our working people are endangered by the present immigration. Cheap labor, ignorant labor, takes our jobs and cuts our wages.

The fittest survive; that is, those that fit the conditions best. But it is the economically weak, not the economically strong, that fit the conditions of the labor market. They fit best because they can be got to work cheapest. Women and children drive out men, unless either law or labor organization stops it. In just the same way the Chinaman and others drive out the American, the German, the Irishman.

The tariff keeps out cheap foreign goods. It is employers, not workingmen, that have goods to sell. Workingmen sell labor, and cheap labor is not kept out by the tariff. The protection that would directly help the workers is protection against the cheap labor itself.

The Nashville convention of the American Federation of Labor, by a vote of 1,858 to 352, pronounced in favor of an educational test for immigrants. Such a measure would check immigration in a moderate degree, and those who would be kept out by it are those whose competition in the labor market is most injurious to American workers. No other measure which would have any important effect of this kind is seriously proposed.

The need of regulation may be less sharply felt at the present time, when there are less men out of work than there were a few years ago. But the flood of cheap labor is increasing, and its effect at the slightest stagnation in industry or in any crisis will be fearful to the American workmen.

A fall in wages or a relative fall of wages makes the workers unable to buy as large a share as before of the goods they produce. This hastens the time when overproduction or underconsumption will show itself. That means hard times; and when hard times come the mass of immigrants that prosperity attracted will be here to increase the burden of unemployment.

For these reasons the American Federation of Labor believes that the present opportunity ought not to be allowed to pass without the adoption of an effective measure for the protection of American labor.

I earnestly hope that you will be able to procure the embodiment of an illiteracy test for immigrants in the bill (H. R. 12199) which the House now has under consideration.

I have the honor to remain, yours, very respectfully,

SAM. J. GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

Following is a copy of the amendment offered by Mr. UNDERWOOD, and adopted in the Committee of the Whole House by vote of 86 yeas and 7 nays on May 22, 1902:

"Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, it has been an hour or more since my amendment was read, and I would like to have it again reported.

"The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported by the Clerk.

"The Clerk read as follows:

"'Amend the bill by adding as a new section, between lines 14 and 15 on page 4, the following:

"'"SEC. 3. That in addition to the persons excluded under the foregoing section, admission into the United States shall be denied to all persons over 15 years of age and physically capable of reading who can not read the English language or some other language; but an admissible immigrant or a person now in or hereafter admitted to this country may bring in or send for his wife, his children under 18 years of age, and his parents or grandparents over 50 years of age, if they are otherwise admissible, whether they are so able to read or not.

"'That for the purpose of testing the ability of the immigrant to read the inspection officers shall be furnished with copies of the Constitution of the United States, printed on uniform pasteboard slips, each containing not less than 20 nor more than 25 words of said Constitution printed in the various languages of the immigrants in double small pica type. Each immigrant may designate the language in which he prefers the test shall be made, and shall be required to read the words printed on a slip in such language. No two immigrants listed on the same manifest shall be tested with the same slip. An immigrant failing to read as above provided shall not be admitted, but shall be returned to the country from which he came at the expense of the steamship or railroad company which brought him.'"

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 192) fixing the time when a certain provision of the Indian appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1903, shall take effect.

IMMIGRATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to print some statistics in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to print statistics in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to object, but I would like to ask the gentleman what statistics they are?

Mr. SHATTUC. Immigration statistics.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Furnished by the Immigration Bureau?

Mr. SHATTUC. No.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I want it understood that on the question of illiteracy the figures cited by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] are not official figures, because those statistics are not authorized by law and have never been taken officially, so we will simply have to take the statements of the immigration officials on these subjects for what they are worth.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will say to the gentleman that some of these statistics that I have read were gathered by me from the census reports and others I have gathered from the reports of the Bureau of Immigration.

Mr. SHATTUC. Did the Chair put my request for unanimous consent to print in the RECORD some statistics?

The CHAIRMAN. There was no objection to the gentleman's request, and it was granted.

Mr. SHATTUC. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask my colleague from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] if we can not agree on the matter of closing debate?

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I have requests for about forty-five or fifty minutes' time on this side. That is the extent to which I have been requested to yield time. I am willing to make any reasonable agreement.

Mr. SHATTUC. Then, Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the gentleman take his forty-five minutes this afternoon, and that I have thirty-five minutes to-morrow afternoon, after the morning hour.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the committee that according to his recollection of what took place in the House this morning, no order for the division of time was made. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] was recognized, as chairman of the committee, and consumed fifty minutes, having ten minutes remaining. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] was then recognized, as a member of the committee, and yielded one hour, which was entirely consumed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. SHATTUC. That all grew out of the fact that I did not ask the House to carry out an agreement that I had made with my colleague on the committee [Mr. RUCKER]. I wish now to put it on the basis on which it would have been had I asked the House to allow my friend to control the time on that side. I therefore renew my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio will restate his request.

Mr. SHATTUC. I ask unanimous consent that the general debate close in one hour and a half, forty-five minutes to be allotted to each side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that general debate close in an hour and a half—forty-five minutes to be consumed on each side.

Mr. WATSON. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio how the time on this side is to be distributed?

Mr. SHATTUC. One-half of the forty-five minutes on this side to go to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. WATSON. Give me thirty minutes and I will agree to it.

Mr. SHATTUC. I will do it.

Mr. RUCKER. I shall make no objection to the request unless some other gentleman on this side signifies a desire to speak, and I have heard of none.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will then state the request of the gentleman from Ohio, which is that general debate be continued for one hour and a half—forty-five minutes to be controlled by the chairman of the committee and forty-five minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. KLEBERG] is recognized for fifteen minutes.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, in looking over this bill I find nothing especially objectionable. Possibly the clause in section 21 which authorizes the deportation of aliens to be made within five years should be limited to one year or two years. I believe the law now is one year. Of course there may be some details of the bill to which I would object and to which I may offer amendments as the bill is read; but as a general scheme of intelligent control of undesirable immigration to this country, I believe that upon the whole it is a measure that should meet the support of this body.

Mr. RAY of New York. May I ask the gentleman a question right on that point?

Mr. KLEBERG. I have only fifteen minutes, but I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAY of New York. You were speaking of the deportation feature of the bill. I should like to have you state, if you can, how this Government can enforce a provision of law providing for the deportation of a man whom we have permitted to land in this country and stay for one or two years or three years, whom we then deport for some offense. Of course, we could send the man away, but how can we compel the foreign country to receive him if that country objects? I should like some suggestion on that point.

Mr. KLEBERG. I am not referring to the legal question, and I do not want to enter into any controversy with the gentleman from New York, because my time is limited and I want to address my remarks to other subjects in the bill; but I will state that my information is that deportation has taken place under the one-year clause. I do not know how many have been deported, but I understand that some have been.

Mr. CLARK. We are deporting Chinamen all the time.

Mr. KLEBERG. Now, aside from this, I will address myself principally to the amendment which will be offered by the gentleman from Alabama, possibly, or some of the friends of that measure; and I wish to enter my protest now, because I may not have the time when the bill is read under the five-minute rule, to the so-called educational test. I think that a test of that kind would be an absolute bar to all further immigration in the United States. A test which required the reading of a part of our Constitution in some language will have the effect of practically barring all immigrants who are now employed for manual labor, and yet who will make desirable immigrants.

I do not wish it to be understood that I do not want to have people immigrate who are able to read and write. But let us remember that while the United States is the greatest country under the sun, we do not have our gates open simply for educated men, for professors, or for artists, or for singers, and sculptors, and classes of this kind. This country, let it be remembered, is still a new country. Seventy millions of people upon an area as large as that of the United States is simply a drop in the bucket to what it ought to be and likely will be fifty or a hundred years hence.

Let us remember that this is not a matter of national pride. We do not stand here simply either as the descendants of Germans, or Frenchmen, or of Italians, of Irishmen, or of Englishmen, or Poles, or what not. We stand here as American legislators, legislating for the American people, and for the Aryan race the world over, so far as immigration to this country is affected.

Now, my friend has alluded to the fact of illiteracy as an objection to intelligent or patriotic citizenship. I grant that. But that, gentlemen and Mr. Chairman, is a question of naturalization. I have no objection to making naturalization laws which will only admit to citizenship people who understand our institutions and who are amenable to our institutions. But while that is a question as to the naturalization law, is it any reason why we should object to a man, as illustrated by my colleague from Missouri, who has two strong hands and is sane in body and mind, who is willing to do and to work and to build up the stratum from which we will have to draw our citizenship in the future? Let it be remembered that not only statistics but the opinions of eminent economists teach us the fact that citizenship must constantly reinforce its ranks from the lower strata of society, provided it has the necessary racial characteristics.

Now, I have advocated Chinese exclusion, and I am against the amalgamation of inferior races with the race of people which is naturally designated American. But can it be said that we will confine our selection to the immigrants from Germany or France or England? Shall we exclude Italy, a people with as illustrious and glorious a history as any in the world? Shall we exclude the Italians, the descendants of proud Rome? Shall we exclude the Greeks, the descendants of the proudest nation of ancient times; or the Poles, who have an illustrious ancestry, or any other like people? I say, Mr. Chairman, that any people who can trace their ancestry to the Aryan race are a valuable acquisition to American citizenship. It will not do to shut out the hardy laborer, the man who is willing to work, and who brings here a healthy body and mind, and who is not a criminal or a pauper.

Many of our citizens, or at least the ancestors of many of our citizens, came to these shores possibly not able to read and write a technical document such as the Constitution of the United States, yet their descendants are among the most eminent and most successful citizens in this country. As long as there is a good race, as long as the right kind of people—or rather historic ability in the race of people—that come to American soil, they should not be excluded. Our industrial development will march on by leaps and bounds, and while it is right that we should protect our laborers, the time will come when we need more laborers, these men who are to do the manual work of this great nation, to build up and develop our industrial resources as they will develop in the future.

Are we to shut ourselves in by a Chinese wall, and say that only our children, our posterity, shall work, that only those inside of our citizenship shall do the work of this great nation, industrially and intellectually? Should we not open our gates to all desirable immigration, to workmen, to laborers, as well as men of science, and artists? It is those people that we need; the people who will come here and develop and build the railroads, clear the forests, open the mines, and do the work that some of our citizens are now not necessitated to do. The time will soon come when we will have to look for these laborers to do the work of our great industrial enterprises in every direction.

Every new enterprise will create a new demand for labor and new opportunities. As the population of this nation increases, the means of subsistence will increase; the more people, the more to do for them; the wider the field of cooperation, the quicker the progress of civilization, the greater the comfort and happiness of the individual, the healthier the growth of industrial, social, and political institutions. This is the law of evolution, to which all municipal and national legislation must conform. As our industrial system expands our population must expand likewise, and be invigorated by the influx of new people racially kindred to the resident population. Invention, skill, energy, and intelligent organization of both capital and labor will develop our industrial life in the near future as it has never been anticipated before.

And then, if we are simply drawing on our own population we can not look for the intelligent development and for the necessary development that we are to make in the coming generations. Now, the idea of excluding these people, who come here healthy, willing, and who will make law-abiding citizens, who wish to better their condition and our condition, who come here to work, and who will labor and who will be amenable to our institutions, and who will continue to add to our growth and progress—it is preposterous; it is folly. It is foreign to the genius of our Government.

The gentleman from Indiana who read the extract from the Post, from the eminent Austrian professor, only emphasized one side of that question. If you will read the able editorial in the Washington Post, it points to the fact that our educational system—the system of public schools—should be extended over that kind of population and embody it in our American citizenship. Go and build the schoolhouses, open the doors of the schoolhouses, make the necessary legislation, if necessary, compulsory, and in one generation the children of the Italian, of the Pole, of the Slav, or whatever kindred race will be an intelligent and useful American citizen. There is no objection to admitting that class of immigration. Why, our laborers and labor unions and labor organizations do not object so much to the people who will come here and do manual labor as they do to the artisans, to the men who can read and write and who will enter into active competition with them in the factories. That is the class of laborers against whom they inveigh—the artisan who can read and write.

I do not go to the extent of excluding intelligent people, artisans who can read and write; I am willing to let them come in under reasonable regulations, provided they come voluntarily and are not brought here under contract and introduced into this country as so many cattle. If they come of their own free will, whether they can read or write is not the question; we shall need them all in our economic, industrial, and in our political system. We shall have room for them in the future as in the past.

We need the leaven of immigration; we need the new blood from year to year. The gentleman from Alabama says in a few years our blood or that of our posterity will run down and be degenerated by such immigration. I reply to him that if we shut ourselves in by a Chinese wall and do not have the influx of new blood and new immigration, always confining it, of course, to the right kind of races—to the Aryan race—the time will come when this great people will degenerate because of the want of new blood and new incentive. That is the lesson history teaches, exclusion of new blood means decay.

The only way this nation can go forth and work out its great destiny is by the same step and the same gait it has taken from the beginning, and that is to open its gates to all desirable immigrants, to those men who are willing to work; men who are honest; men who are not paupers; men who are not criminals, no matter whether they can read or write or have money; and they are the stratum from which we must draw our magnificent citizenship in the future, as we have drawn it in the past. New blood, fresh people from the parent stock of the Aryan race, brought under our free institutions, under the Constitution, under our ideas of government, will, together with our resident population, build up this Western continent and nation so that it will truly set the pace, not only in political life, but in the industrial, commercial, and moral life of the nations of the world.

Talk about morality, why, is it not true that you find immorality under the cloak of persons who can read and write? Frequently and in most instances you will find anarchy, the spirit which is against and inimical to our institutions, under the velvet cover of the so-called educated gentry who come into this country and afterwards become editors of anarchistic papers and agitators, political and otherwise.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

[After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to oppose the educational test of fitness of immigrants into this country, but I want to point out what minute and unimportant value, in my judgment, will grow out of such a proposition. Nobody appreciates the value of education more highly than those men who never had an opportunity for education. There is no man holding membership in this House who knows better than I know what a weight it is to put upon a young man to be deprived absolutely of all means of education, and be compelled to make his own way by the best available sources of knowledge and information that he can get without the benefit of schools.

The difficulty that grows up in the discussion of this question is the failure to distinguish between nonintelligence and illiteracy. Therefore, the proposition to submit an educational test of any character that is properly covered by the words "educational test" is valueless, in my judgment, and harmful, in my opinion. I have not the time to work this subject out, except to point out some teaching of history on that subject.

The gentleman from Texas, in the closing remarks he made, pointed to the very suggestion I want to make. If we have any purpose in these exclusion acts, it is to benefit our country, to benefit the aggregation of our population, to protect our country from the dangers that follow the promiscuous immigration of foreigners into our land.

Now, history ought to teach us something on this subject, and I presume that the advocates of this measure will say that their object in this proposition is to exclude illiterate people from the United States in the interest of a better condition to us than would follow the promiscuous introduction of illiterate people into the country. I think there is no greater stumbling block in the way of an intelligent study of this question than the idea that education—a literary education, an education in books and letters—fits a man especially to be a citizen of the United States, and that the absence of that sort of education unfits him.

Now, looking over the history of my country, I do not find any justification for the theory that illiterate men have been especially harmful to the American Republic. Going back to the very dawn of our national existence, I find that the men who led the forces, the intellectual power, that created the great organization of Tories in this country, were all of them the very best educated men. I am going to point out now that no evil came to this country, no evil ever menaced this country, from ignorant men, and on the other hand I affirm that such menace did come from the educated men.

Look at the teachings of the Tories of the Revolution; and I always look to those people with a kind of sympathy, for they were the "regulars" of that day, and we were the "rebels." They were the "Loyalists," as they always called themselves. But they do not stand very high in the estimation of the historian or of the American people. The leaders of that class were all of them educated in the New England colleges. Four men of one single family who were the outspoken leaders of Toryism were graduates of three of the New England colleges of that period; and some of the educated people of New England and New York and Pennsylvania and New Jersey were among the leaders of the Tory party of that day.

Coming down to 1812, when the illiterate people of this country were standing by the Government, what was happening along the coast of New England? We had a nation then, and treason consisted in just what it does now, for the Constitution had been adopted. The Hartford convention was born of the machination of college-bred men.

I had occasion to go down to that particular country on a certain occasion not many years ago, looking for some evidence of a character that might be disclosed by the muster rolls of certain regiments of New England troops. There were some regiments called out in Connecticut to defend our coast at Stonington and other points against the threatened invasion of the British army that had been attracted there by the disloyalty of the Hartford convention advocates and the men of the colleges of New England who denied that we were rightfully at war with Great Britain. And when I got hold of the muster roll of one of the companies of one of those regiments I found a wonderful sprinkling of men who signed the pay roll with a mark. There was a pretty good exhibition. One was the loyal man, who could not write his name, fighting to protect his country, and the other was the educated man, who had laid the plans that brought the enemy there and caused the necessity for calling those men out.

Who laid the foundation upon which was builded the superstructure of the idea of the right of a State to secede and go out of the Union? Who was it that educated the people of the South, and who was it that declared that he had been thirty-five years educating the people of the country, through speeches and the press, up to such a condition of opinion as at last opened the way for the great rebellion? Was that rebellion the result of ignorance and illiteracy? I am not here to discuss the right of it or the wrong of it; but whatever there was of evil in it came through the educated people who had trained the people of the South to that belief.

Now, let us look at the question in more modern times. Who have been guilty of the murders that have startled the world? Who have formed the conspiracies that reddened the ground with the blood of some of the best people of the earth? Was it an educated man who drove the dagger of death into the heart of that lovely woman, the Empress of Austria? Or was it a man educated in not less than three languages, who could have passed this educational test and come into this country? Who slaughtered the King of Italy? Who destroyed the President of France? All of them educated men. Who struck the blow that killed Lincoln? Who fired the shot that killed Garfield? Who laid the plan and murdered McKinley? Was there an ignorant man among them, judged from the standpoint of literacy or illiteracy?

Was there ever a menace of harm to the Government of the United States, either in the formation of anarchistic societies or in the development of outbreaks against the authority of law, that did not come from conspirators who were educated men? They could all have come in under this educational test, they could all have come here and taken seats, most of them, as professors in our colleges and universities, and yet you would put up that test against the harmless man who comes over here to earn his living and who has no idea of rebellion against the Government, who comes here to take what he can get and be content with that, and you would drive him out while you held out a premium in your own statute, your own legislation, to the organized conspirator against the Government—the educated criminal class who come to this country to use their educational strength and power to undermine and overthrow the liberties of their country.

Mr. Chairman, I have other views upon this particular topic and other illustrations. I know the time is very short for debate, and I shall say no more at this time, but ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD along this particular line and upon the direct topic about which I have spoken.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, Mr. Chairman, I understand perfectly well the cheap demagogy of any attack upon a member of Congress because he does not believe in the sovereign remedy of the exclusion of illiterates. No man has a higher regard for the common-school education and the collegiate course of education in this country than I have, and I will not stop to reply to the assault made by the gentleman from Indiana. It is unworthy of a man who has had the opportunities that he has to assault others under the circumstances that surround this situation, and I regret that he should have done so.

The argument which the gentleman has made in favor of the unfitness of the illiterates to participate in American citizenship would apply with equal force and potency in justification of the disfranchisement of the colored men of the South, and I congratulate my friend from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] that he has at last planted himself upon an argument that is absolutely irresistible in justification of the disfranchisement of the colored people of the South.

If the test of illiteracy is the true test of intelligence and the true test of the fitness of the foreigners to participate in our Government, it is by like argument and by like effect and reason a conclusive argument why the colored men of the South and the white men of the South and the white men of the North and the colored men of the North who can not read and write should be excluded from citizenship, and my friend from Indiana has at last planted himself upon the indestructible argument, if his premises are correct. I do not believe any of this.

I can not better define my own position than by reproducing an address which I had the honor to make on two separate occasions last summer at certain Chautauqua assemblies. It embodies my views of to-day, and for what they are worth I here insert them under the order of the House.

THE ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

The question of greatest moment to the future of the United States and to the people thereof has grown out of the question of the elective franchise of the States of the Union. The basis of our Government and its admitted claim of right to live is based upon the consent of the governed. The Declaration of Independence put that proposition in few words when it was said that among the inalienable rights of man are those of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," and then followed those words which have been so often wrested to the undoing of the man who tinkers with them, "That to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." Here was the fundamental declaration of our forefathers, which we have from time to time by innumerable acts and declarations cordially and earnestly indorsed and ratified.

Acting upon this fundamental basis the States of the Union have, from time to time, fixed and altered laws and regulations touching the qualifications of voters. It has grown to be a settled factor of law in our history that Congress can not interfere to regulate or define the right of citizenship and the right to vote in the States, and that practically the only foothold Congress has that in anywise affects the relation of the voter to the Government and that fixes the qualification of a voter is to provide that unless the American citizen is allowed to vote in the several States, and if any disqualification of such citizen shall be by reason of color, race, or previous condition of servitude, that person shall not be counted to make up the representation of the State in the Congress and in the electoral college.

Here, then, is a most important and salutary provision. The State is left free to fix the qualifications of the voter absolutely. It may disqualify a man from the electoral franchise because of the color of his hair, perhaps, unless there is something in the constitution of the State which forbids it; but if the disqualification touches or is affected by or is based upon the color, the race, or the previous condition of the voter, then Article XIV of the Constitution applies, and here is the wording:

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice-President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State being 21 years of age and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens 21 years of age in such State.

Now, the law of the country, it seems to me, and I think there is no dispute about that, is very plain and simple. If a State of the South sees fit to say that the colored man of the South shall not vote because he is a colored man it has a perfect right to do so, but such State must submit to a reduction of representation in Congress and in the electoral college. The brave old Senator, JOHN T. MORGAN, of Alabama, a man who has no idea of indirection and no toleration for quirks and quibbles, presented in the Alabama convention a clean-cut proposition to disfranchise the colored man because he is a colored man, and to submit to the terms of the Constitution of the United States and stand the reduction.

But throughout the country, mainly at present limited by the Mason and Dixon line, the wit of man is being brought into action to devise a system that shall not be obnoxious to this provision of the Constitution, and which shall at the same time operate to disfranchise the colored man. Hence all sorts of schemes have been devised, and the false and fraudulent pretense that education and intelligence is to become more fully than heretofore the basis of the right to franchise is being insisted upon. In some instances no doubt this is an honest and sincere proposition, but in many other instances the humbug of it and the fraudulent character of it is too manifest.

I have no time to discuss at full length and in great detail the fraudulent character of the attempts that have already been made, and I do not wish to interfere and discuss and to express opinions in regard to matters and measures which are purely within the legitimate purview and jurisdiction of the States themselves. That is to say, I want to discuss the question from the standpoint of what is best for the nation at large, and what is fair and just to the individuals affected, but by no means denying to the States a perfect right to deal just as they see fit with this very mighty question. But the people of the whole country have a right to be heard. They have a right to discuss the question which, in my opinion, is fraught with mighty consequences of evil to the body politic of the United States itself.

On this occasion I shall mainly give consideration to the discussion of the claim set up that it is at this late date wise and proper to take from men already exercising the right of franchise the ballot because of their supposed unfitness to be trusted, because of their ignorance and hence their lack of intelligence. First, I may say that it is a dangerous thing to take from a man that immunity and that privilege which he holds dearest of anything on earth. It is one thing to provide that the man coming to this country in the future shall have to comply with a new outfit of qualifications or that he shall not begin to vote. It is one thing to say when the youth becomes 21 years of age he shall not vote unless he possesses certain qualifications, but it is a widely different and other thing, based upon widely different and other questions and affecting other and widely different interests, when you take away from a man who has been for years a voter the right and privilege to vote.

In so many words I put it, a punishment, a penalty without conviction, and he goes forth stripped of his privilege and branded as an unfit and incompetent man. Can you imagine anything more horrible to the mind of a man, even though he may not be versed in the literature of his country or able to read in the various languages of modern education, who for thirty-odd years has been steadily voting at the polls for or against men and measures, and suddenly, without notice to him, without his consent and without his day in court, the right to vote, the great immunity, the great prerequisite and privilege of an American citizen, is taken from him.

The man of the South when upbraided on this question calmly says to you, "Look at Massachusetts, the model of States, and the home of model statesmanship; they have disfranchised men by reason of their illiteracy." I answer that two wrongs do not make a right; but there is this mighty distinction between the legislation of Massachusetts and the legislation proposed here and now under discussion. In Massachusetts no man who had been a voter was disfranchised by reason of illiteracy, but it was the coming man, the coming voter, who was coming to the polls upon whom the test was fixed. There is a vast difference. In one case you fix a qualification upon the claim of the voter and in the other case you strip from a person a privilege which he has for years and years enjoyed.

Here is the great difference and here is the fundamental outrage of this whole transaction. It is the taking away from the man of the right which he has enjoyed. But I will not go into details. I want to discuss another proposition. It is that this system now being sought to be introduced into the Southern States is a plan to take from the voting list the men who are dangerous to the welfare of the Commonwealths because of their illiteracy, and therefore because of their unfitness to discharge the duty of citizenship in this direction.

It has not been said at any time that the ignorance of a man should relieve him from taxation. It has not been said that because he can not read he need not pay taxes. It has not been said that because he can not read a statute and does not know of its existence he shall not be punished for a violation of that statute. By no means. That would startle and shock the very souls of these men. Ah, no. The man, however ignorant, however illiterate, however unfortunate in this regard, must nevertheless pay his full share of the cost of running the government.

Why should a man be put to the expense of citizenship and be debarred from participation in the affairs of citizenship? Why should a man be punished for violating a statute that he has never read and can not read and the existence of which he never knew anything of, and yet be refused the right to vote for a man to alter, amend, or repeal that statute? I leave the questions naturally incident to this phase of the discussion to be solved by the statesmen of to-day who are seeking to undo the history of the past and to write into the new constitutions a guaranty against the unfavorable operation of existing statutes.

But I want to discuss another phase of it. Is the ignorant man necessarily unfitted to be a voter? By the word "ignorant" I mean illiterate, uneducated, not versed in letters, not able to read the English language or the French language or the German language; not able to translate Greek and Latin, even as ignorant of Greek and Latin as 99 out of every 100 graduates of American colleges are at the end of ten years after their graduation; not capable of understanding the Constitution of their country.

Permit me here to deflect for a moment. The condition upon which franchise is based in one of the States is that the person claiming the right to vote shall be able to understand the constitution of the State in which he lives, and yet there is not a day passes in that State that there is not more or less discussion among the best educated men of the State as to what the constitution of the State means.

Why, think of it. As I have already shown, for one hundred and twenty-odd years the best legal ability of this country, the ablest lawyers of the country, have been arrayed on two sides of the mightiest question of constitutional construction that has ever fallen to the lot of man to be affected, and generations have come and gone and the discussion has gone forward, and decision after decision of the Supreme Court has been made and overruled, and quarrels have risen and gone forward as to what the decisions of the Supreme Court meant, and the poor old Constitution has been kicked and cuffed about in the highways and byways of the country almost unceasingly. And yet here is a qualification of the voter that he must understand what the Constitution means.

Why, take our Supreme Court, with the nine great judges, and ask them to say what is the meaning of the words "the United States" in the taxing power, or rather the limitation of the taxing power, in the Constitution, and we will have three different opinions from that august body as to what the real meaning is, and yet the man who belongs to the class that builds the wealth of the earth and delves in the earth and brings forth the blessings of Providence as the result of his toil is to be deprived of his right to vote because he differs with a set of partisan judges about the interpretation of the Constitution.

But I am not through on that head. No man appreciates more highly the value of education than I do. No man appreciates more keenly the disadvantages of no education than I do. No man need tell me how weak is the man who, because of poverty in his youth, was unable to secure the blessings of a liberal education. No man need to tell me how valuable to him has been any scrap of education that he may have acquired in any way. Our forefathers, when they established the Northwestern Territory and set the greatest example of patriotic legislation that has ever been established among men by the passage of the ordinance of 1787, which was in point of fact the keynote of all these constitutional discussions, put into that immortal instrument that "Religion, morality, and knowledge, being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall forever be encouraged."

No truer words were ever uttered, and time has developed and made unimpeachable their wisdom. But the real question is not involved in that opinion nor in the experience that has grown therefrom. The question that we are here to solve is this: Shall it be established in the United States that because a man can not read and write, he is therefore necessarily and for that reason alone unfit to vote at the elections? That is the whole of it. It narrows itself right down. It does not broaden out, but it grows more and more narrow as you investigate it.

If that be true, if the illiterate man is not fit to be a voter, if the true test of fitness is the power of the individual to read and write, there ought to be some reason shown for it. No honest man will say that the right to vote should be taken from these illiterate persons unless it can be shown that there is a public necessity for it. To strip a man of the right to vote must be based upon some public reason, and it must appear to be a duty that is due to the public at large, or else it is wrong, and will be so held by all thinking men.

What is, therefore, the public reason, if there be one, why the man who can not read ought not to be allowed to vote? Is it something that he and the men like him have done? I take it that it will hardly be said that because some of these men have voted a different ticket from that which the constitutional tinkers vote, that therefore the power of the majority to disfranchise may be rightfully exercised. I think that the most energetic exponent of the idea of disfranchisement by the majority of the minority will concede that the ground for it must be a different ground from that. I assume that it will be said that per se the man who can not read can not be intelligent, and therefore ought not to vote.

My answer is that the record of the voting that has been hitherto done in this country does not bear out the suggestion, and voting in the United States is a record of wisdom. By some means we have nearly always voted right in the United States. Has it been a triumph of education and intelligence over illiteracy and ignorance? Has it? Will the supporters of this new idea assume that responsibility? When the people of the United States by an overwhelming majority of those who voted decreed that Abraham Lincoln should be the President of the United States, and with it that the dogma that the Constitution went everywhere and upheld slavery in the Territories should be wiped off the slate of American ideas, was that a bad vote?

When the American people voted that the war for the upholding of the Union was not a failure, and that Grant and Sherman and Sheridan and Lincoln should be upheld, was that a bad vote, an unwise vote? When down through the whole period from 1864 to 1896 the American people voted as one man to uphold the credit of the Government and dig up by the roots the fallacy of financial humbuggery that was invented, and voted to destroy the idea of irredeemable paper money, and voted to destroy the idea of two coins in this country, one of 100 per cent value and another to be half that ratio, was that bad voting? Was it?

When the people of the United States in 1896 and 1900 voted to tear from the throat of demagogy the doctrines of anarchy, the doctrines of bad money, the doctrines involved in all the isms that pervaded those two campaigns, was that bad voting? When the people of the United States, with the cry of imperialism ringing in their ears, were told that the Constitution was being overthrown, that imperialism and czarism were to absorb the Republic, and that the Government of the United States must be withdrawn from the islands of the sea and our flag come trailing home in disgrace and dishonor, and the people of the United States by an overwhelming majority voted the other way, was that bad voting?

So you see you must look elsewhere than at the general results to establish the proposition. If during the next thirty-six years this country shall progress with one-half the ratio that it has during the last thirty-six years it seems to me that it will be idle to appeal to the people of the country to recognize the voting force of the country because harm has come to the country by reason of illiteracy and ignorance among the voters. This brings me to a point in which I feel great interest. First, has it been the ignorant and illiterate that have menaced harm to the United States, been disloyal and unfaithful in the hour of her need? And second, is it the ignorant and illiterate that to-day menace the future of the Republic?

Let us see. It was not the illiterate men of the old thirteen States that stood by King George and became Tories and perpetrated war and murder against the loyal people of the colonies in the great struggle for independence. Take the history of the Loyalists of New England and you will find that a large proportion of them were men of liberal education, graduates of the colleges; all of their leaders men of education, men who could read and write, and, therefore, wholly qualified, under this new system of salvation, to be great citizens of a country. Benedict Arnold was not an illiterate man. He was an educated man, and this statement applies with truthfulness to the whole body of men who stood by King George.

In 1812 the men who sought to weaken the power of the United States in the prosecution of the war, were they illiterate men, or were not the men who stood by the Government in 1812, many of them, illiterate men? History tells us that there was a period of time when there was a convention held somewhere in this country to take the side of Great Britain in the struggle of 1812, and history tells us that during that critical period of time the British fleet off the coast had opportunity furnished them to beware of the proximity of danger by certain signal lights which were given a flaunting in their interest. So says history.

Were those men of the Hartford convention ignorant men? That was a critical time in our history, that was a time that tried men's souls, that was a time when the line was sharply drawn. Were the men who took the side of Great Britain illiterate? I think not. But I will give you an illustration. Right when this treason was being enacted the British ships had been lured to the destruction of certain towns on our seacoast and the men of the country surrounding were called upon for patriotic duty and organized themselves into companies and regiments and flew to the seacoast to fight John Bull and prevent the burning of the cities, and not very long ago I had occasion in another interest and for another purpose altogether to hunt up the pay roll of one of those regiments and I was amazed at the large per cent of men who signed those pay rolls for the meager pay they got with the badge of illiteracy, their mark, but they were loyal men and they were standing by their Government, and they were seeking to counteract the treason of the men of education who had plotted against their country. Let us go forward. I only point to these landmarks, by no means exhausting the subject.

Go to the controversies of 1860 and back of that and trace the period of time when it was made possible that a great war that should devastate the homes and destroy the best fruits of our civilization should spring up for the overthrow of the Union, was it ignorant and illiterate men who plotted? Was it men who could not read and men who did not understand the Constitution and who had never graduated from schools or colleges that sowed the seed that blossomed and bloomed into a million untimely graves and sent off to struggle with life a long somber column of widows and crying children and broken firesides?

Was that horror brought about by illiteracy? Was it ignorant men who denied the right of this Government to protect itself? Was it? Was it ignorance and illiteracy that inculcated and instilled in the minds of the people of the South the doctrine of Calhoun? In other words, was there ever a great question of law, a great question of morals, a great question of patriotism against which was hurled the thunderbolts of opposition and that opposition did not come from educated men, men of the colleges, men of the universities, men of the high schools, men of the common schools, men in every walk of educated life, men from the newspaper offices, men from the professions, men from the educated columns of men?

These were the men that sowed those seeds. These were the men that sowed the dragon's teeth from which the crop of horrors was harvested. Who stood by the Government? Who carried the musket? Who held the plow? Who made it possible in all these wars, from the Revolution to this day, that this Government—founded upon intelligence, founded upon the principle of equal rights, founded upon the principle of individual liberty—might by its power at the ballot box, in the halls of legislation, and behind the guns, typical of the great power of government, uphold itself and enforce the principles involved in its organization?

Who were they who in the war against Spain, a war for humanity, a war dictated by the almost unanimous voice of the American people, invaded the armies of our soldiers and sought to promote disruption and crime? Illiterate men, ignorant men, were they? Men who did not understand the Constitution? Who were they who sent forth to the world that Aguinaldo was a second George Washington, and that the result of the election would be the withdrawal of the troops and the disgrace of the American armies? Were they ignorant men? Were the men who fulminated these doctrines and disgraced American manhood—were they illiterate?

But let us go to another phase. This country is threatened in more or less degree by an element which I shall call, for the want of a more comprehensive and condensed term, anarchy, liberty, and license combined—the doctrine of the red flag, the anarchistic doctrine that all governments are wrong, and in favor of organized or perhaps unorganzied resistance to law. It is tapping, tapping, tapping at the foundation stone of our Republic. This hideous monster is insidiously pervading our land. In large part its advocates and devotees are coming from the old country. In large part they have been driven from there by reason of their crimes or by reason of their incendiary suggestions and opinions.

They are filling the press of our country, a certain portion of it, with their infamous doctrines. They are sapping and mining like moles underneath our labor system. They are teaching that resistance to government is the law of God. Are these men illiterate men? Are they uneducated men? They read and write. Do they come under the bane of the Maryland statute or the Mississippi constitution? Far from it. They are educated men. They are capable, so far as educational qualification is concerned, to take chairs in our colleges and universities, very many of them. They are posted upon history. They are familiar with the literature of the day. Many of them are men of unequaled education. Their danger consists in their complete education.

Was it an ignorant man who slew the President of France because he was making the Government so popular that it might dethrone anarchy? Was it an ignorant man that drove a knife into the gentle, liberal, and benevolent heart of the Queen of Austria? Was it an ignorant man who slew the King of Italy a few months ago? Was it an ignorant man who sought the life of the Prince of Wales in the railroad station at Brussels? Was it an illiterate man who shot to death Abraham Lincoln in Ford's Theater in the city of Washington? Was Guiteau illiterate and ignorant, or would both those men have been entitled to vote under any of the restrictive phases of any of the legislation upon that subject to which the country has been treated during the last two years?

The answer to all this is that under the restrictive laws of the United States, residence having been acquired, every one of these men might have voted, while thousands of men who carried muskets in defense of the country would have been turned aside. This illustrates Mr. Gladstone's suggestion that the most dangerous man, if he be an immoral man, is the best educated man. Who are standing to-day in the United States of America as a great insurmountable bulwark of patriotism and protection to these institutions of our country that we love? A great army of educated men, I admit, but also a great army of men who would be disfranchised under the Maryland law.

Who carried the muskets that saved this Union and all its blessings? Educated men? Certainly. Illiterate men? Who dare deny it? There was no test made in 1860 and 1861 when the Government cried out in its agony, "Save, or we perish." The soldier who was enlisted and who put down his name was not asked to define the principles of the Constitution, and when he marched to battle and fought for his country and came home bearing the old flag in triumph it was not a condition of the warm reception of the people that he should stand a literary examination, and his pay was handed over to him with the same cordiality of the paymaster when he signed his name with a mark as though he had signed it in the most flowing chirography.

Who was it, when the wise Americans believed that the best institutions and purposes of our country were menaced by the falsest of all false dogmas of politics, came forward in response to the demands of patriotism and none other and voted to strike down the hideous monster that threatened the welfare of the community? Were they educated men? A vast proportion of them were, but a contingent without which victory was impossible were the men who could not read or write. But you say the number is small; then I say, Why disfranchise them? If you say that all these great things have been worked out, all these achievements have been the result of the action of educated men, then I say, Why strike this cruel blow? By that argument you destroy the proposition of necessity and you lead a crusade of cold-blooded cruelty when there is no need of it.

Let me put the argument in its concrete form. All these glorious results have been worked out from the first by the greatness and glory of the education of the country or by the cooperation and patriotism of the illiterate men of the country. If by the latter, then they should not be punished, for they have been true and patriotic. If by the former, then there is no need of this legislation. Either we have come to this condition of glory by the help of these ignorant men and because they were powerless to do harm, or else we have come to this condition over and against their power to do harm, and in either event the argument is simply unanswerable.

Thus it will be seen that this crusade, at this late date, when for thirty-odd years, under present conditions, we have tested this question, is purely an unnecessary assault and an unnecessary changing of conditions suggested by no demand of the hour.

There is another phase of this matter that is worth considering. You can not have a disfranchised class in a free government without making of that class enemies of the government. Take the State of Maryland as an illustration. There is no more patriotic State than Maryland; no State whose citizenship is more in harmony with the institutions of the country than Maryland. By the Gorman act it is proposed to disfranchise about 30,000 of the voters of Maryland, men who now and for many years have been voting.

These men are to be taken up and, without a day in court, are to be stripped of the highest right of an American citizen, a right vested, as I say, by every principle of humanity and common decency. It is to be done in the interest of a political party, as it will be done everywhere in that interest, if done at all. Think you that the disfranchised men will be fond of and faithful to the institutions of Maryland and the United States, or will they stand aside branded, condemned, assailed, a class second only to the imprisoned and the criminal and the vicious, and will they not hate a Government that thus treats its citizenship?

There will be men go to the polls in Maryland next November who, within a generation, have marched to the muzzle of the enemy's guns in the war for the Union, and they will be turned aside as unfit to vote because they can not read. Think you that they will love the country for which they formerly fought, or will they be an organization of enemies of the country, enrolled, organized, sent forth? And there is more than that. They have sons and sons-in-law. Think you that the son or the son-in-law of the man known to be faithful and honest and upright who is thus deprived of citizenship will be friendly to the power that disfranchised the father or the father-in-law? Will the coming young man love a country that took the services of his father in the war that saved the Union from destruction and then turned around and forbade that man to vote? Think you that that son will be a loyal and loving citizen of the commonwealth, or will he and his boy go to the polls to punish the party that has dared to thus stigmatize his father?

I have thus far not discussed the subject of the negro, but I may say that all I have said of the loyalty and faithfulness to the Government of the illiterate white man can be said as truly in as large degree, at least, of the colored man. He is loyal to this Government. He believes in it. He will follow the men who are loyal. I wish here to incorporate a statement taken from official figures in regard to what the colored man has done. I quote from a recent speech by Mr. George H. White, a colored man and an ex-member of Congress from North Carolina.

In the past thirty years the illiteracy of the colored race has been reduced 45 per cent. They have written and published nearly 500 books. We have nearly 300 newspapers, 3 of which are daily. We have in practice nearly 2,000 lawyers and as many doctors. We have accumulated over $12,000,000 worth of school property, and $40,000,000 worth of church property. We have about 140,000 farms and homes, valued at $750,000,000, and personal property valued at $170,000,000. We have raised $11,000,000 for educational purposes.

We are operating successfully several banks and commercial enterprises in the Southland, including a cotton mill and a silk mill. We have 32,000 teachers in the schools of the country; we have built 20,000 churches, and support 7 colleges, 17 academies, 50 high schools, 5 law schools, 5 medical schools, and 25 theological seminaries. We have done this under the most adverse circumstances, in the face of lynching, burning at the stake, disfranchisement of our male citizens, and the violation of our women; with the factories closed against us, no negro permitted to be an engineer or conductor of any railroad train, most of the mines and the labor unions closed against us, and few negroes permitted to be employed in our mercantile stores.

And I further quote a statement of what the colored man is doing from the business standpoint in the United States from a statement made by Hon. Judson W. Lyons, the Register of the Treasury:

The colored race is playing a much more prominent part in the industrial activities of the country than is ordinarily supposed. It is producing 80 per cent of all the cotton grown. The crop of last year was 10,000,000 bales, at an average price of 10 cents a pound, making $400,000,000 as the value of the cotton produced by the colored people. On this cotton crop of America is dependent every person employed in cotton manufacturing in either this country or abroad—millions of families who are dependent for their chance to earn their daily bread upon the production of American cotton, not to speak of the uncounted millions in China, Japan, and Europe, who wear cotton goods and are therefore dependent upon the labor of those who produce the cotton from which these goods are manufactured.

The colored people of America produce easily 75 per cent of all the rice that is produced in this country; 90 per cent of all the sugar and molasses, and 75 per cent of all the rosin and turpentine in the raw state; 65 per cent of all the corn that is grown in the South, and a like proportion of the output of all the iron and coal mines of the South. In every industry that entails outdoor labor in the South the colored man is doing the major part. Without him the great wave of prosperity and industrial progress that is now sweeping over that section would be impossible.

Thus it appears that the colored race has reduced the condition of illiteracy 45 per cent, and that, too, under all the troubles and turmoils under which they have labored, and if left alone and encouraged the cry of illiteracy among the colored men will gradually and indeed at last rapidly diminish.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WATSON].

[Mr. WATSON addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, seldom will a member or committee of the House be called to defend when legislation is unenacted and plead in justification that they have done all that can be done under the rules of the House in the line of a public duty.

I speak for myself rather than for the Committee on the Territories, of which I am an humble member, but what I say applies as well to it and to all its members. The action of the committee speaks for itself. The Democrats and the Republicans should cease talking of the Louisiana purchase, should not hold expositions to commemorate it, should not refer to it in partisan debate till the last unorganized vestige of it, Indian Territory, is given an organized form of government worthy of the name.

It is a reflection on the Republic when any part within its borders has no civilized government, and it is a no less reflection when known that the only part where anarchy practically prevails is a part of the Louisiana purchase.

The people of Indian Territory desire the security and benefits that a Territorial form of government will give them, the protection to their rights and the safeguarding of their interests—such as an American citizen deserves and ought to have.

If these people who are asking you all by letter to give them this do not receive it at this session of Congress, it is not the fault of the members of the Territory Committee, or of that committee which has unanimously expressed its judgment in favor of it. That committee has performed its duty, and the burden now rests upon the House, upon all its members, and you must answer to your thousands of former constituents who have gone there and to those who favor it who have remained at home for this failure to give the rights due to American citizens. You talk of cruelties in foreign lands, you have something akin to cruelty and oppression near at home, within continental United States itself. Members without number have received letters. Members of the committee have been besieged by them, asking us to help an unfortunate people, to remove the bonds of oppression that keep them from the guarantees of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and to give them the simple and usual form of Territorial government that will enable them to educate their children, to care for their poor, their insane, and incorrigible.

Indian Territory, 400,000 strong in people, three-fourths of whom but a short time ago were your constituents and mine, is asking it. These people are the best yeomanry from every State of the Union. Eleven thousand of them alone born in the State of Illinois, and other States, according to conditions, likewise represented; thousands from Maine, Massachusetts, and the Eastern States.

Why deny these people some civilized government when they had good governments back at home?

Of the 400,000 inhabitants of this Territory 75,000 are Indian and mixed blood; but these are not Indians as many of us understand the term. One going there can scarcely pick out, from their appearance and by their action, 10,000 as Indian, they are so mixed with the white—so like them in their pursuits and conduct. There are scarcely any blanket Indians in the Territory—not nearly as many as in the State of Kansas. There are fewer blanket Indians than confessed dudes in the streets of Washington or New York or the larger cities, each of which class is equally baneful, one to the upper and the other to the lower stratum of society.

Indian Territory is the land of the Five Civilized Tribes—the Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, Creek or Muscogee, and the Seminole—originally from Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, and Tennessee.

The men are active in every avenue of business. They were made citizens of the United States by an act of the last Congress.

They are educated and alert, and people from the States to their country must understand this, or going there they will, by their intelligence, thrift, and industry, be driven from the field of the professions, from business, from the farm, and the ranch. Indian Territory in agricultural lands is one of the richest places in the world.

Each one of these five nations has a fairly good government of its own. There are, however, 325,000 of other people in this domain, which is about the size of Indiana and but little less in size than Maine.

In 1874 the Mansfield Digest of Laws of Arkansas was compiled in that State, and by acts of Congress subsequently was in part carried to the Indian Territory. Without codification or revision these remain, and, coupled with the Curtis Act of 1898, gave some measure of relief to towns of 200 or more people, giving these towns school facilities. These towns comprise a school population of 30,000 and a total population of 75,000.

Those in towns have some facilities and a partial though crude form of organized government. The laws, respectively, of the Five Civilized Tribes take care, in a crude way, of their children and their people.

But outside of the Five Civilized Tribes and the 90 incorporated towns, the 100,000 school children have no schools and no means of public education, and the people have no government that gives them protection or secures their rights save the practical rule of anarchy that might makes right, and brute force and violence triumphs over all.

So far as the government is concerned they are left to grow up in ignorance and vice, to fill the houses of corrections and prisons, and if they are not treated better in after life than their Government treated them in youth and adolescence they will become wanderers and outcasts on the face of the earth. The executive government is made up of three United States marshals, and in the enforcement of law they are aided by three United States attorneys.

These people have no laws to give them public roads or bridges or ditches; they have no schools; they have no asylums or eleemosynary institutions. Twenty-five daffy, demented, and silent witnesses from the Indian Territory in the Government Insane Asylum across the Potomac River from Washington, D. C., speak more eloquently than words can tell of the woes of 400,000 American citizens. They were railroaded 1,500 miles away from friends and home to get the only treatment that this Congress furnish to these unfortunate people, and thus you see the injustice of government.

Untold scores of these unfortunates are scattered throughout the eleemosynary institutions of the border States, shifted away to other States to get treatment for them and protection for those who remain.

Within two weeks three insane came to the Washington Asylum, sent by the court of the Indian Territory, and in each case the criminal charge was assault, and they were acquitted because insane. It does not require a shrewd guesser, and I suspect that the court in desperation at the intolerable conditions stultifies itself and twists the law to get the refuge of asylum for those who maybe should never have been charged with crime.

Let me read what was said by Mr. S. B. Bradford in January, 1902, who was then United States commissioner, and since deceased, in his testimony before the committee:

> I wish to give you a few facts only. We have 50 national banks in Indian Territory and we have 37 private banks. We have 75,000 school children absolutely without any school privileges. We have insane people chained down like wild beasts, in their little cabins, because there are no laws for their relief. We have no public roads in Indian Territory except those voluntarily constructed by the people themselves. We have no bridges or schoolhouses outside of the organized towns and the cities except those built by private subscription. There is no law to build a bridge and not a syllable of law for the issuance of bonds to build schoolhouses, waterworks, or anything for the purpose of saving property, except in the Creek Nation.

The Committee on the Territories had hearings at that time, which were printed and may be had by members.

That committee considered the bills before it and authorized the distinguished gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] to report favorably the bill, which he did in a report that will convince the impartial of the needs and necessity for this legislation.

This report was made on March 14, 1902, and provides the usual and simple form of Territorial government. Since then the bill has hung on the Calendar, between heaven and earth, like Mahomet's coffin, not in silence, while those people suffer, but while they clamor loud and long for the United States laws to protect them from the oppressive conditions under which they are living.

The report by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is a succinct and careful statement of facts and reasons, and I will append it to my remarks. Some guardians, self-constituted, may claim that the people are not ready for or able to bear self-government, but this is refuted by the universal expression of the people themselves and the press, expressed publicly and in a private way. It is refuted by the nearly 400,000 of people, by the richness of the soil, by its 50 national and 37 private banks, with a capital and surplus of over $3,000,000 and deposits of over $7,000,000; by its $60,000,000 of assessable personal property, $4,000,000 in coal mining and coke ovens, 1,500,000 cattle, 400,000 horses, 65,000 mules, 400,000 swine, 25,000 sheep, and 1,500 miles of railroad in operation and 300 more under construction, not to mention wheat, corn, oats, and cotton, the last year's crop of the latter aggregating over 200,000 bales.

There are 3,000 miles of telegraph and telephone lines in operation.

Yet, in this theater of modern endeavor and civilized work, if a man die suddenly or mysteriously the law does not give him the poor privilege of a coroner's inquest to ascertain the cause of death. And here it is that the insane are chained to a tree or to the floor in their little cabins.

Talk to me of the discontent in Ireland, tell me of the woes in foreign countries, but rather give me encouragement for this Territory so near to home.

President Harrison recommended a reform, a change of government, and that these people should be represented by a delegate in Congress. He said that "the cattle syndicate now occupying the land for grazing purposes" interfered with the negotiations with the Cherokee Nation.

Are they still there? I understand they are, and are as perverse and arrogant as ever.

The exploiters are the ones who declaim against this relief, this act of justice to these people. The governor of Oklahoma in his last report recommended the enactment of legislation that would remove the chaotic state there existing. He said:

> Affairs in the Indian Territory are somewhat chaotic. It is a question of legislation and not of administration which presents itself. The Administration, under the present laws and conditions, must necessarily move slowly. There are too many questions to consider and difficult problems to solve for the executive department of the Government to be charged with the responsibility of solving them at long range, and it is practically impossible for these questions ever to be satisfactorily solved until representatives of these people, who are responsible to the people and community directly, are elected to Congress with the responsibility of working out these difficult problems. The Indian Territory situation is without precedent in this country. * * * What the Indian Territory most needs is wise legislation, which will lay the foundation of an American community with proper provisions for schools, churches, convenient highways, and the exercise of political rights and individual responsibility.

I am not certain what the course of events will bring forth, but, speaking for myself, I believe that the policy of uniting at some future time Indian Territory to Oklahoma will be wise and well. The omnibus Territorial admission bill recently passed provides for that, and the giving of Territorial government under the Moon bill to Indian Territory, it seems to me, will be a long and wise step in the accomplishment of that desired end. This bill has slumbered on the Calendar for months, not in silence or in peace, but in a dreadful nightmare, for every breath it drew measured the loss of education by 100,000 American school children in the Indian Territory; every sigh brought up the discontent over the injustice of Congress. This bill is bound no closer to the Calendar than are the unhappy and violent insane, chained to the trees and the floors, awaiting to be carted, if their relatives will permit it, 1,500 miles away to the asylum in Washington, D. C., or to asylums of sister States that will charitably receive them.

It is on the Calendar, ready for the action of the House.

If the Speaker and the gracious Master above do not help those 400,000 people and these unfortunates, it will be because their prayers have gone unanswered. [Loud applause.]

APPENDIX.

[House Report No. 956, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

TERRITORY OF JEFFERSON AND GOVERNMENT FOR THE SAME.

The Committee on the Territories, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12268) to create the Territory of Jefferson and to provide a temporary government for the same, and for other purposes, respectfully report:

The committee believe that a Territorial form of government, such as this bill provides, will put in the hands of the people of the Territory now known as the Indian Territory the machinery for correcting the evils there existing, satisfy their present needs, and go far toward giving them the legislation demanded by the population and resources of the country. There exist conditions in the Territory that can not be adequately and timely met by Congress, and can be responded to only by a local legislature.

The lands embraced in the boundaries of the Indian Territory are a part of the Louisiana Purchase made under the Administration of President Jefferson. This Territory, excepting that part embraced within the Quapaw Agency, was created by a number of treaties entered into at different times between the United States, the Cherokee Indians, the Muscogee or Creek Indians, and the Choctaw and other Indians. The detailed provisions of these treaties may be found, together with a history of the statutes and departmental orders, and the relation of the Government to the various Indian tribes now occupying the Territory in part, in Senate Executive Document No. 78, Fifty-first Congress, first session, being a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, dated March 12, 1890, to the President of the Senate. Previous to the immigration of the tribes specially mentioned to the Territory during the years 1831-1838, under the treaty stipulations, they resided in the States of Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi, and Tennessee.

The act entitled "An act for the protection of the people of the Indian Territory, and for other purposes," approved June 28, 1898, tended greatly toward alleviating the deplorable conditions then existing in that Territory; it enabled the development of the Territory to increase, as well as afforded greater security for life and property, but is inadequate to meet the present conditions which are constantly changing. The act authorized the organization of towns having 200 inhabitants or more to possess the powers and rights of similar towns in the State of Arkansas, but made no provision for the protection of life and property and educational facilities outside of the corporate limits of the towns. The people who live outside of incorporated towns are afforded no police protection except through the United States marshal's office; in fact, the only executive government in the Territory is a government by United States marshals.

The Indian Territory, which comprises an area of 31,400 square miles, by the census of 1900 has a population of 391,960, of which only about 75,000 are Indians or connected with the Indian tribes. The people are intelligent, industrious, enterprising, and law-abiding, accustomed to live in a different state of society and to participate in the affairs of local self-government.

According to the census, there are in the Territory 159,125 persons of school age, of which 32,000 are Indian children, and the remainder are not members of the Indian tribes. Of this class, 29,900 live in the incorporated towns and have the advantages of free school facilities (public schools being maintained in incorporated towns under power conferred by the Curtis Act), and the remainder, 97,225, have no free school facilities whatever, there being no means by which they may be maintained in the rural districts.

The real estate in the Indian Territory is at present exempt from taxation, the title to the whole body of the lands outside of the towns being yet in the Indians, but the taxable property is sufficient to support a Territorial government. The following data, obtained from reliable sources, give a conservative estimate of some of the property subject to taxation:

Ninety incorporated towns, including only about 75,000 of the population, have an assessed valuation of taxable property of $20,000,000. A conservative estimate of the taxable value of unincorporated towns is $5,000,000. There are 1,500,000 head of cattle; 400,000 head of horses; 65,000 head of mules; about 400,000 hogs, and 25,000 head of sheep. There is invested in coal-mining and coke-oven properties about $4,000,000. There are 1,415 miles of railroad in operation, and about 300 miles now under construction. A conservative estimate of the entire taxable wealth of the Territory could not be less than $50,000,000. No estimate is made of corn, wheat, oats, and cotton, which are also extensively produced in the Territory.

The Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, in its report to the Secretary of the Interior, speaking of what the Commission found in the Territory when it went there in 1893, said:

"Instead of an arid Western plain, occupied by the savage of tradition, as many suppose, the Commission found a Territory not greatly smaller than the State of Maine, rich in mineral and agricultural resources and in valuable timber; a country which has been occupied and cultivated for over half a century, whose fertile valleys yield bountiful harvests of Southern products, and whose prairies graze 250,000 cattle yearly; where cities have sprung up, through which railroads have been constructed, and where five distinct modern governments existed independent of the sovereignty of the United States."

In 1891 President Harrison, in a message to Congress, called attention to the conditions existing there and to the need for some organic change in the relation of these Indian tribes to the United States, and recommended that the change involve the acceptance of citizenship by the Indians and representation in Congress.

Congress, by act approved March 3, 1901, conferred citizenship on every Indian in the Indian Territory.

With each year there is a large influx of people from almost every State in the Union seeking homes and occupations in that country, vastly and rapidly increasing the population, so that the necessity for organic change and representation in Congress is much greater than when President Harrison first called attention to it.

This bill gives to the Indian Territory the name of Jefferson. It seems fitting that from the vast tract of land included within the limits of the Louisiana purchase, possessing such wonderful resources, some portion should commemorate the name of the President who brought it under our flag.

The government provided for in the bill is in general similar to that provided for other Territories in the United States. The treaty rights and land titles of the Indians are fully respected, and it does not conflict with the Indian tribal organizations as secured to them by law. The Indians are protected in all of their rights. The judicial system now in the Territory and the laws now in force are continued.

The people of the Territory are without adequate roads; they have no schools in the rural districts; they have no asylums for the unfortunate, for the deaf, dumb, blind, and insane, and not even provisions for the holding of coroners' inquests. They can not have these because of no law for local self-government. The laws in force there are totally inadequate and necessitate a continual clamoring at the doors of Congress for new and needful legislation, making their claims in the lobby for lack of representation on the floor—of a body unfamiliar with their conditions. This manner of securing legislation is fraught with obvious objections, as is evidenced by the long and persistent petitioning of Congress for such laws as have been heretofore enacted.

Those who prosper under the chaotic conditions are sufficiently influential to prevent the enactment of many needful laws, to the great injury of the majority of the people. Whereas with a local legislature composed of persons directly interested and familiar with the conditions and wants, and directly responsible to the people, the embargo on the enactment of necessary and useful laws is removed. This idea is further impressed by a message of President Harrison to Congress in 1889. Referring to the negotiations for opening what was known as the "Cherokee Strip," now a part of the Territory of Oklahoma, he said:

"The cattle syndicate now occupying the lands for grazing purposes is clearly one of the agencies responsible for the obstruction of our negotiations with the Cherokees."

The governor of Oklahoma, in his last report to the Secretary of the Interior, says:

"Affairs in the Indian Territory are somewhat chaotic. It is a question of legislation and not of administration which presents itself. The administration, under the present laws and conditions, must necessarily move slowly. There are too many questions to consider and difficult problems to solve for the Executive Department of the Goverment to be charged with the responsibility of solving them at long range, and it is practically impossible for these questions ever to be satisfactorily solved until representatives of these people, who are responsible to the people and community directly, are elected to Congress with the responsibility of working out these difficult problems. The Indian Territory situation is without precedent in this country. * * * What the Indian Territory most needs is wise legislation, which will lay the foundation of an American community with proper provisions for schools, churches, convenient highways, and the exercise of political rights and individual responsibility."

In the opinion of the committee it is certainly an anomalous situation, which demands prompt relief, that a section of country almost as large as the State of Indiana and occupied by 400,000 people should be left without the protection of civil government.

The committee believe that this bill will correct all of these evils and grant to 400,000 American citizens rights to which they are entitled.

The committee therefore recommend the passage of this bill without amendment.

THE PRESS OF INDIAN TERRITORY ON THE PROPOSED TERRITORY OF JEFFERSON—FREE SCHOOLS, SELF-GOVERNMENT, REPRESENTATION IN CONGRESS—H. R. 12268—PRESS ACCEPTS MOON BILL.

It will be seen that these newspapers represent all sections of the Territory, all political beliefs and of various convictions regarding ultimate statehood, yet in unison they speak for their people in demanding local self-government of the present Congress:

CHEROKEE NATION.

[Chelsea Commercial.]

The question of single and dual statehood has been a long-discussed one that has not of itself evolved a solution or even approached one. * * * In the meantime we will see the Moon bill passed and the B. I. T. started on a new era of prosperity. It is the duty of all to put our shoulders to the wheel for the Moon bill and stay with the fight until we win.

[Claremore Progress.]

Prospects of legislation for the Indian Territory all point to the adoption of the Moon bill and the Territory of Jefferson. So let it be. As Messenger has pointed out before, there are many grave errors in the Moon bill, but it is at least a step in the right direction, and the other steps will come a little later on. After the ice is once broken it will not be so difficult to secure the legislation of which the country actually stands in need of. We can not expect to get just what we want on the first throw of the dice. We are in favor of the Moon bill, not so much because of what is in it at present, but in spite of that. Other things will follow.

[Tahlequah Arrow.]

The bill introduced in the House of Representatives providing for a Territorial form of Government for Indian Territory is conceded by the Territory press as the best measure, by far, ever offered for the relief of the inhabitants generally of this country, and when Congress adopts the measure it will be the taking of the initial step to place one of the brightest gems in the starry crown of American liberty and thus honor and guarantee the perpetuation of the name of one of the greatest statesmen and patriots in history. If this bill is passed, and every indication is that it will be, it will be an assurance that at some future time a great Commonwealth will bear the name of the illustrious Jefferson, and that Commonwealth will be the most beautiful country on God's footstool—Indian Territory.

CHICKASAW NATION.

[Sulphur Springs Journal.]

The South McAlester Capital is red hot for the Moon bill, as it and every other paper in the Territory should be. This is about all we can hope to receive at this session of Congress.

[Ada News.]

The Moon bill, creating Jefferson Territory, is favorably accepted by the people. It's the unanimous verdict of those with whom we've talked that it's the best yet proposed except statehood itself.

CREEK NATION.

[Wetumka Herald.]

The hope of the people of the Indian Territory is again aroused over the prospects of a Territorial form of government, and to-day those prospects are bright. The people of the Territory have succeeded in convincing many Congressmen that not only does this Territory need a government, but that it deserves it. The justice of our cause is what makes it strong—makes it irresistible. And while many are convinced and favor the enactment of a law giving us a real government, yet there is a strong opposition. The pie counter is large and profitable, and only the most persistent efforts should be our motto until the Moon bill has been passed by both Houses and approved by President Roosevelt.

[Checotah Times.]

The passage of the Moon bill will be welcomed by Territorial people generally as a long step forward. We believe a majority of the people interested will be very well satisfied with its provisions, realizing that it gives the best form of government that can be expected by Territory people under present conditions. The greatest concern just now is that it may be held up in the Senate and not reach a final passage during the present session. It seems to us that such tactics by either branch of Congress, in the face of existing circumstances, would be little short of criminal, and it is certainly to be hoped that the pleading going up from this Territory for some remedial legislation will be heeded and the necessary relief be granted speedily.

[Tulsa Democrat.]

The amended Moon bill, giving the Indian Territory a Territorial form of government, is acceptable to all factions in the former statehood fight. Until a few days ago there was a division of sentiment regarding legislation that would remedy present conditions, but on the refusal of the House Committee on the Territories to report favorably on either single or double statehood for Indian Territory and their substitution of the Moon bill all former convictions were cast aside and a united campaign is being waged for the passage of the Moon measure.

Thousands of letters are being written by people all over the Territory to their former Congressmen and Senators pleading for the recognition of Indian Territory. No one but a resident of the Territory can appreciate the possibility of release from departmental rule. Business circles are feeling the pressure very strongly, and there are few who are not in accord with acceptance of any legislation that will release the Territory from bondage.

In several towns public meetings have been called to draft memorials to Congress, and the papers are filled with reasons for recognition. The impression prevails that the House will pass the Jefferson Territory bill without much debate and with a few amendments, but the Senate is expected to make a fight on the measure.

CHOCTAW NATION.

[Durant Citizen.]

One of the most interesting topics agitating the minds of the Indian Territory people this week is the Moon bill providing for a Territorial form of government. The bill has been introduced in the House, referred to the Committee on the Territories, indorsed by that committee, and referred back to the House with recommendation that it become a law. It is now up to the House as to what it shall do with it. It is confidently believed by some that the House will pass it; but next, what will the Senate do? The people of this Indian Territory are breathlessly waiting to applaud the act of Congress that will bring relief.

[Hugo News.]

Eternal striving for the unattainable is wasted energy; therefore, let us direct all our efforts for the betterment of our present condition toward something we can get. There is no doubt that the present Congress will give us a half loaf—if we cease trying to capture the entire bakery. The Moon bill just at present seems to have the best chance of becoming a law, especially if it is properly urged by the residents of the Territory. Let us take what we can get until something better is offered.

[Spiro Gazette.]

The Moon bill will be very acceptable to the people of Indian Territory, and the people will always remember Congressman MOON as a friend of Indian Territory.

[Ardmore Appeal.]

There is no possible chance of getting any kind of statehood at this session of Congress. Even the persistent advocates of statehood, both single and double, have given up their hopes of securing the passage of a statehood bill.

Such being the facts, then the people should take the next best thing, the Moon bill, which provides a Territorial form of government for the Territory. However, they can not get the bill through without hard work. While it is true that the Moon bill has been indorsed by the House Committee on Territories and that it will undoubtedly be passed by the House, yet there is a fight ahead in the Senate. The bill will greatly relieve the conditions here and will place us several milestones nearer the statehood goal.

It provides for a skeleton form of territorial government. It gives us governor and other territorial officers besides a Delegate to Congress and a legislature, which shall be composed of 15 members in the upper and 39 in the lower house. According to its provisions the present laws and acts of the Indian tribal governments shall be repealed and the collection of permit taxes prohibited. On a whole, this bill is the best piece of legislation which we can hope to get, and we had better get it. Write to the members of Congress and urge them to pass the bill. Don't delay. Write to-day. Here is an opportunity for us to take advantage of. Shall we do it?

[Choctaw Gazette.]

If we can not get a "whole loaf" we had better take what is offered. Visions of statehood, like mirage, is always just ahead of us. If we can get a territorial form of government, however light, it is paving the way to something better. Under existing conditions the wheels of progress are clogged, enterprise crippled, and golden opportunities slipping by. There is no reason why this Territory, with its vast undeveloped mineral resources, its farming, grazing, and timber lands, should not become one of the brightest in the Southwest. It is the duty of every one to use their influence to bring about these conditions. Politics should be put out of sight and all join hands for a measure that will bring about the greatest good to the greatest number.

[Marietta Monitor.]

As the House Committee on Territories has recommended the modified Moon bill, every citizen of the Indian Territory who desires a change from our present form of government should go to work in earnest and urge its passage in the Senate. There is little doubt that the measure will pass the House by an overwhelming majority, and the only danger of it becoming a law is in the Senate. No sane man can longer expect statehood at this time; consequently we should all strive to secure the next best thing to it, which is a full-fledged form of Territorial government, the same that is provided for by the Moon bill.

[Chickasha Democrat.]

Mr. MOON, in his Jefferson bill, names South McAlester as the capital. Anything will do for the chief city so we get a change in affairs.

[Sulphur Journal.]

The people of the Territory are ready and willing to accept the Moon bill, and were it left to a vote of the people it would meet with almost unanimous indorsement.

[Spiro Gazette.]

It is thought that Congress will adjourn about June 15. The Moon bill is about the most important measure that body has on hand now, and unless it runs up against something more substantial than the Soper-Quarles bill it will go through both Houses in less time than it took Nancy Hanks to win her race.

[Vinita Chieftain.]

The Moon bill provides a partially satisfactory introduction to future enfranchisement. Congress evidently believes in acquainting the people of the Territory with liberty in gradual doses; but the little taste will be very, very palatable. The only opposition to the Soper home bill comes from the 400,000 residents of the Indian Territory, who want to know who gave him authority to barter their liberties for a carpetbag machine.

[Webber Falls Monitor.]

A Territorial government for the Indian Territory at the present session of Congress seems to be a possibility. Many think that is the thing to do. Statehood would entail a very heavy expense on an undeveloped country and unsettled conditions. Under the proper Territorial incorporation the people in a short while could launch the proud ship of a great State.

[Pryor Creek Clipper.]

Much has been said in the past of the Indian Territory's wonderful progress. We are transforming a waste into a busy province. Persons seeking investments in property or business locations should investigate the opportunities that are remaining undiscovered in this section. A vast domain of land so rich in natural wealth is yawning to be producing profitable grain, not weeds. The Moon bill is the only restorer at present for it.

[Vinita Chieftain.]

The absurd argument that all of the Territories are clamoring for statehood is used by the opponents of the Moon bill to prove that a Territorial form of government is unsatisfactory. The American people are so constituted that nothing less than complete self-government will ever satisfy them. The Territorial government is the natural stepping-stone to statehood and was never intended to be a permanent condition. The Territory of Jefferson will make itself heard on the statehood question when the appointed time arrives.

[Checotah Times.]

Those who believe that the Moon bill would afford the Territory temporary relief from the galling conditions that now prevail, and that it would be a stepping-stone to statehood, not a hindrance, should espouse their belief and throw their influence in support of its passage. The Times sincerely believes that the benefits to be derived from the enactment of this bill would a hundredfold outweigh the added burden of taxation that it would impose. For this reason we believe that no community can afford to place obstacles in the way of the passage of this legislation, more especially when opposition is clearly evoked from purely selfish or personal motives.

[Coalgate Courier.]

Quite a number of papers are condemning the South McAlester Capital for so actively championing the Moon bill—the relief bill for Indian Territory. We are unable to see the objectionable features of the Moon bill that seems to be so prominent with these calamity howlers. We say give us the Moon bill and give it to us now. The Moon bill is far preferable to anything else that is on the list of "probables" for the settlement of the existing complications in Indian Territory. The Capital expects South McAlester to be benefited by the passage of this bill, but we feel sure that this is not the only motive that prompts the Capital to fight for the passage of the bill. It will probably benefit South McAlester more than any other town, but then every town can not expect to be the seat of the government, and therefore should not condemn the bill because it does not name their particular town. Let the Moon bill come, it is just what we want.

[Chickasha Democrat.]

Say, Brother Walker, do not make any fight on the Moon bill. It is not what we want, but it will be one step toward statehood.

[Marietta Monitor.]

With a Territorial form of government such as is provided for in the Moon bill the masses of the people of the Chickasaw Nation will soon be prosperous and happy.

[Lehigh Leader.]

The Moon bill is the only measure that has ever been introduced in Congress that has no element of selfishness, politics, or favoritism. It is the fairest measure that has ever been introduced for the relief of the people of the Indian Territory, and has met with the approval of the people from one side of the Territory to the other.

It provides for a form of government to be established by the voice of the people, for a Delegate in Congress, for schools, for public roads and improvements, and in fact about everything that can be done under the present state of affairs. It is urged by a few people that we want no form of government until the Territory comes in as a State with Oklahoma. But it seems this can not be until the allotment question is completed, and with no chance to settle the citizenship question, it seems certain that the four years yet allowed in the Atoka agreement for the winding up of the tribal governments will be consumed before statehood is possible. At the present rate of determining citizenship contests, it seems possible to make a greatly developed country of this territory under the provisions of the Moon bill long before it can be made a State and titles be given or tribal governments dissolved.

[Coalgate Courier.]

The Ardmoreite says that it doesn't want a Territorial form of government, but wants this country to remain as it is until we have statehood. Just think how unwise such a remark is. Every schoolboy knows that such a course is impracticable and without precedent. A Territorial form of government is the stepping-stone to statehood. Just think of any intelligent person being opposed to a Territorial form of government. The Ardmoreite must undoubtedly know better than this, but of course it is in favor of continuing departmental rule in Indian Territory for reasons known by all, or else it is opposing a Territorial form of government because it thinks the capital will be located at South McAlester. Ardmore is on a direct railroad line from Coalgate, and it might be that a compromise could be made by having the capital located at Coalgate. We are sorry to know that any paper would oppose local self-government which promises to give to the thousands of children in Indian Territory school privileges.

[Cherokee Wigwam.]

The Moon bill, which, if it becomes a law, will give the Territory a home government embracing many of the rights of statehood, is universally favored by those who are not interested in making it a tool for the accomplishment of some scheme. This bill meets the fullest approbation of the people of this section. Let it come. It will be warmly welcomed.

[Nowata Advocate.]

Excessive taxation is the bugaboo now held out by the opponents of the Moon bill. It is the cry of the single-State advocates and is as nonsensical as it is unreasonable. Under the adequate system of government proposed by the Moon bill we would be placed on a basis where we could intelligently prepare for early statehood. The taxes proposed are adequate for our temporary needs and far less burdensome than the taxes that are now being paid by the people of Oklahoma. Why should we be attached to a Territory that has no interests in common with ours when we are big enough and intelligent enough to promulgate and maintain a State government without the aid or consent of a lot of cheap-screw politicians?

[Spiro Gazette.]

In the closing paragraph of a letter received at this office a few days ago from Hon. FRANCIS W. CUSHMAN, a member of the House Committee on the Territories, he says: "I also note your request that I help boost the Moon bill when it come, up in the House. I know Congressman MOON very well, and I am a member of the House Committee on the Territories. I assure you that I will give this matter my attention."

[Stillwell Standard.]

The Standard is for single statehood for Indian Territory and Oklahoma first, last, and all the time, but it prefers Moonshine to no light at all; and the Moon bill is far preferable, a thousand times over, to the carpetbag rule in this country.

[Sulphur Journal.]

The Territory is getting tired of being made the dumping ground for the political misfits, cranks, and reformers, the flotsam and jetsam of the Republican party, and wants relief and home government. The Moon bill will give us the right to elect our own officers.

[Fort Gibson Post.]

The Moon bill is all right—that is, about as near right as Territorial people can expect, and a great improvement on present conditions. With the Moon bill in operation, the people of this Territory would be in paradise compared with present conditions.

[Checotah Times.]

With home rule, a fair field, and no favors, the Indian Territory will establish a new record of development not previously attained in any part of the civilized world.

[Stillwell Standard.]

The Moon bill is the only halfway decent government offered the Indian Territory by the present Congress, outside of the bill offered to give us statehood with Oklahoma. The other measures are all political schemes of pie-hunters and carpetbaggers to make a lot of soft berths in this country. In saying this and swallowing the Moon bill as the best thing in sight, right now the Standard is forced to remark that it can eat crow, but danged if it hankers after it.

[Spiro Gazette.]

What the people want is relief from their downtrodden, helpless condition; relief from our inability to own our homes, educate our children, improve our towns, transact business, elect our officers, enact our own laws, and a thousand and one other things needed. The Moon bill furnishes the relief needed, and unless this miserable gang of chronic office-seekers and heelers can bring a strong influence to bear upon the Senate we may expect to hear of the passage of the Moon bill in the very near future. Then for the grandest ratification ever heard of.

[Boswell City News.]

We are highly in favor of the Moon bill in all its principles of legislation, and we will always be in favor of any bill passed for the relief of the people of the Indian Territory, but we do not like the change of name to that of Jefferson. We honor and revere the name of that noble statesman, and we desire that his memory be held sacred for future generations, but in the name of this, the last small refuge donated to the former possessors of nearly half a confiscated continent, we would commemorate the name of the red man. Call it Tuscahoma (Red Warrior) and let the ages to come see the true picture, implied in a name of a race that could not exist long in the confines of civilization, and whose original cast was faded out by the greed of the white man.

[Hugo News.]

It is a lamentable fact that there are a few papers in the Territory that prefer to have matters remain as they are rather than become a Territory with a Territorial form of government without some proviso for an ultimate attachment to Oklahoma. We can get along a whole lot better without Oklahoma than with it, but that fact does not seem to make any difference. However, the majority of the papers are in favor of a change of some kind, although it may not embody all that we desire, and we suppose that these papers reflect the sentiments of the people. If this be true, there should be no difficulty in securing some sort of relief in the way of a Territorial form of government, and the Lord knows we need it.

[Tahlequah Arrow.]

The Moon bill has been favorably reported by the House Committee on Territories, and as it stands it is by far the most desirable relief measure ever offered in Congress for Indian Territory. It may be a little repugnant to the single-staters, but it is free from the taint of carpetbagism, and has already received the approval of the press of the Territory.

[Ada News.]

The Moon bill is now being ventilated by the press of the two Territories. Its merits and demerits are set forth in such a way that no one can remain on the fence. You are either for it or against it. As for us, we should like to see it become a law.

[Hugo News.]

The call to "get together" on a bill giving us a Territorial form of government is being generally observed by Indian Territory papers—but who in thunder is going to get Walker together?

[Miami Record.]

Nearly everybody in the Territory is Moon-eyed when it comes to a Territorial form of government.

[Denison Herald.]

"Lo" is not worried about names, but he is worried about conditions. If Congress will give the Indians a Territorial form of government, they will accept most any old name.

Every commercial club or other body in the Indian Territory should indorse the Moon bill. It is one of the best measures ever introduced for the benefit of the people of the Indian Territory.

[Antlers American.]

It is evident that the dissension in the Territory will be a great barrier to legislation for our "relief" passing the Senate. That body has openly charged that the different kinds of legislation asked for is evidence that we want something but we do not know what. The Indian Territory people know one thing to a certainty—they have had a good and plenty of departmental rule—government by "hand out" as it were—and will welcome a change. It now appears since the declaration of that kaleidoscopic body that it is up to the Territory people to agree on what they want or stay in the pillory until another session. Congress has decreed that no kind of statehood is coming this session. That eliminates the issue which has divided the Territory, and every man in it should stand up and make himself heard.

The Committee on Territories has recommended the modified Moon bill to the House, and there seems no doubt but that it will pass the House. The danger will be in the Senate, and the Territory should bring all possible pressure on that body. It is the final lift, and if it fails we fall back into the old rut for two more years at least. The Moon bill is the most liberal of the proffered legislation. We can get that by united effort of the press and different organizations. Regardless of party affiliations or former efforts for statehood, the relief of 500,000 people demands a solid front.

The Senate openly says "we do not know what we want." Let us take the hint and agree on the "next best" to statehood, and convince them that while we differ on homeopathy and allopathy we never doubted we had the disease.

PROPOSED TERRITORY OF JEFFERSON.

[Globe-Democrat.]

By a unanimous vote the House Committee on Territories has decided to recommend the organization of the Territory of Jefferson, now Indian Territory. The name selected could not be improved. It would honor a statesman whose national achievements deserve to be commemorated in the list of States, and also give his name to a part of the Louisiana purchase—a most felicitous idea. Indian Territory needs the attention and speedy action of Congress. Its development has been surrounded with many peculiar difficulties, due to its exceptional status under old tribal treaties. In the course of time these conditions have become a burden and hindrance to all the inhabitants of the Territory, regardless of race lines. For one thing, public education is paralyzed, and when a great number of children in an American community are growing up without public schools the case is simply intolerable.

Sensible members of the various tribes in Indian Territory want their children to be educated and also know that the present confused and insufficient government is hurtful to all its citizens alike. Provision is made in the bill approved by the House committee to adjust, in a spirit of fairness, the questions upon which treaty issues have a proper bearing. Details ought to be arranged in a conciliatory manner. The main point is to get away from the present deadlock and create a Territorial form of government, able to meet the demands of intelligent progress. Every person in the Territory will be benefited by the proposed new order of things, which will be directed by a legislature chosen by the inhabitants themselves. The people of the country in general are ready to say: "All hail to Jefferson Territory."

THE MOON BILL.

[Denison Herald.]

The South McAlester Capital, in urging the people to go to work for the Moon bill providing for a Territorial form of government for Indian Territory, says that the Congressmen complained that the trouble Congress has in doing anything for the Indian Territory is caused by a lack of knowledge of what the people of the Territory want. They ask for so many things that the minds of Congressmen are confused, and they can not figure out just what the people want.

It appears that in the very nature of things there should be no confusion in the minds of Congressmen as to what the people really want.

The people have spoken, and they have said every time they have spoken that what they wanted is a form of local self-government.

That was the cry of the Oklahoma-Indian Territory convention at Muskogee.

That was the cry of the "Double statehood" convention at Muskogee.

Both conventions expressed a desire for a form of local self-government as soon as in the wisdom or discretion of Congress the people were ready for it. That is, the double statehooders asked that, but the single Staters wanted a local self-government right now, immediately, without waiting for the tedium of winding up Indian affairs, which they said might be done as well, as safely, and speedily under a form of State or Territorial government as under the present arrangement.

Every organization, every convention that has spoken on Territorial matters, has stated that what the country needs and wants is a form of local self-government.

That is what the people want. What are Congressmen and Senators for if they are not elected for the purpose of going into the meat of things and producing results? The statesman is elected for office because the people have confidence that he may select the best form of law or government that may be had. The Congressman who applies his attention to a plan of local self-government for the Territory, and secures the passage of a bill, is entitled to the thanks and praise of the people of that country.

The Moon bill is a good measure, on the whole, and having been approved by the committee, it stands a good show to pass. It is well enough for the people to go to work to secure its passage, and if it is secured, it will do more to advance the Territory in every conceivable sort of prosperity than anything that the Territory has had since it became a part of the map of the Southwestern country.

[Antlers American.]

S. C. Treadwell, of Tishomingo, is out in a strong letter urging the people of the Chickasaw Nation to meet in the towns and neighborhoods in the nation and thoroughly discuss the Moon bill and indorse it. It would be a good way to get Congressional action.

FAVORS THE MOON BILL—VIEWS OF AN INDIAN CONCERNING LEGISLATION FOR THE TERRITORY.

[Ardmore special to the Dallas News.]

The Moon bill, providing for a Territorial form of government, is being advocated by the leading papers of the Indian Territory, which are urging the people to accept the proposed legislation. With some changes in the bill, it would be acceptable to the noncitizens.

The Indians would rather see the lands allotted before Congress passes a measure of this kind, although at the Atoka meeting the Indians were silent on the proposition of Territorial government.

F. F. Fox of this city, who is an Indian, speaking of the Moon bill, said to the News correspondent:

"Those people who are still agitating single statehood for the Indian Territory are fighting for a hopeless cause, as far as the present is concerned. Not only that, but they are retarding the chances of getting relief from the present anomalous, unsatisfactory conditions provided for by the Moon bill, which has received a favorable report from the House Committee on Territories. Wisdom dictates an acceptance of the best form of government that can be had, not a blind devotion to that which is impossible. It bids us not take what we want, but what we can get. The enemies of the Moon bill oppose it, not on the ground that it is a bad, unsafe, inefficient, vicious measure, but because those who have been instrumental in having it framed are not friends of single statehood. They affect to believe that because it is favored by the advocates of double statehood it will ultimately be the means of defeating single statehood.

"These arguments are fallacious. They are not based on reason, but on mere fears and idle suppositions. The enemies of the Moon bill oppose the bill, not because of its provisions, but because its promoters and advocates are double statehooders. But instead of making it more difficult to secure single statehood, the Moon bill, in my opinion, will be the greatest means of securing it. It will, in giving an opportunity to establish counties and county seats, to elect a Delegate to Congress, to provide for county schools, a Territorial legislature, a judiciary, and many other important changes, hasten the time for Congress to bestow upon us the rights of statehood along with Oklahoma. There is no necessity for the Indian Territory to refuse the benefits which the Moon bill offers in order to be absolutely certain of statehood with Oklahoma in three or four years from now.

"Considerable opposition is manifesting itself against the Moon bill because the capital is located in South McAlester. This opposition is inspired by bitter enmity and envy of the Black Diamond City. South McAlester is the logical capital of the Indian Territory, not only on account of its geographical position, but on account of its being the center of population. Such talk will not appeal to any man who is looking out for the best interests of the Indian Territory rather than for some personal hobby.

"I understand that many who are fighting the bill are doing so for the reason that it contains a provision for the Territorial legislature. Their objections are rather queer, in the face of the fact that they are working in the interest of a statehood bill which embraces a legislative feature. Why a legislature under a Territorial form of government is objected to and a legislature under a State form of government is favored I am at a loss to understand. If a legislature can be maintained under statehood it can be maintained under Territorial government. To say that it can not convicts one of dealing in absurdities.

"What the people of the Indian Territory want is relief. It is offered in the Moon bill, in opposing which we invite a continuation of the present state of affairs, and in accepting which we summons a new era of prosperity and progress—an era of unprecedented increase in population and commercial wealth."

MOON BILL IN A NUT SHELL.

Schools for the schoolless thousands.
Good roads and bridges.
Elimination of tribal tax.
County government.
Legislature to enact laws that fit local conditions.
Accessibility to records.
A delegate to Congress.
Better laws and more officers to enforce them.
Continuation of present Federal judiciary.
The freeman's sacred privilege—suffrage.
Preparation for statehood.

WETUMKA WANTS A CHANGE—RINGING RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE COMMERCIAL CLUB OF THAT CITY—APPEAL.

An appeal by the Commercial Club of the town of Wetumka in relation to the establishment of a Territorial form of government in the Indian Territory.

To the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The Commercial Club of the town of Wetumka, Ind. T., would respectfully and earnestly urge upon you the great necessity of establishing some form of Territorial government for this Territory at this session of Congress.

In support of this appeal we call your attention to the fact that there are now in this Territory half a million people without any form of government except such as the courts may afford; that there are, at the lowest estimate, over 100,000 white children of school age without the slightest opportunities for education; that the people of this Territory are intelligent, industrious, prosperous, and law-abiding; that they are ready, willing, and anxious to bear their share of the burdens of taxation which may be necessary in case such Territorial government is established; that any report, petition, or appeal stating that the people of this Territory are not ready to assume the expense and responsibility of a Territorial government is untrue and a misrepresentation so far as the wishes of this community are concerned.

Passed by unanimous vote of the Commercial Club of Wetumka, Ind. T., April 14, 1902.

MORE MASS MEETINGS—CITIZENS MEET AND PASS RESOLUTIONS IN REGARD TO THE MOON BILL.

The following are resolutions adopted at Ada:

Whereas a bill has been introduced in Congress, known as the Moon bill, providing for a Territorial government for Indian Territory; and

Whereas the said bill in its present form provides the most satisfactory relief from the present hardships, inconveniences, and chaotic conditions in the Indian Territory of any measure yet proposed: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the citizens of Ada, Ind. T., in mass meeting assembled, That we fully indorse the said Moon bill, and respectfully urge upon Congress the necessity for its immediate passage without amendment.

Be it further resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished the Ada Star and the Ada News for publication, and that a copy be sent the Hon. JOHN A. MOON, M. C., Washington, D. C.

U. G. PHIPPEN, Chairman.
J. L. SKINNER, Secretary.

ROFF RESOLUTIONS.

Whereas a bill is now pending in the Congress of the United States, commonly known as the Moon bill, which provides relief from the unsatisfactory conditions prevailing in the Indian Territory more than any other proposed: Therefore we, the citizens of Roff, Ind. T., in mass meeting assembled, do hereby resolve—

That we urge upon the Congress of the United States the immediate passage, in its present form and without amendment, of what is known as the Moon bill.

Resolved further, That a copy of these resolutions be furnished to the Hon. JOHN A. MOON, M. C., and that a copy be furnished to the Roff Tribune for publication.

JOE T. ROFF, Chairman.
B. C. KING, Secretary.

KREBS WANTS LEGISLATION—RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED FAVORING TERRITORY OF JEFFERSON BILL.

Whereas the repeated and just claims of 400,000 American citizens, residing in the Indian Territory, demanding that they be relieved of the present anomalous and chaotic condition of affairs existing in this Territory, and that they be provided with a better and more stable form of government, in order that they may enjoy the blessings of civil liberty and local self-government, rights inherently American and vouchsafed to them by the immortal Declaration of Independence, have at last attracted the serious attention of Congress; and

Whereas the Committee on Territories of the lower House of Congress have unanimously approved and recommended for passage a bill known as the Moon bill, which proposed legislation is carefully considered, and is well calculated to cure the many existing evils and abuses prevalent in this country; and

Whereas we believe that said legislation is well adapted to the present needs of the Indian Territory, and that treaty rights and the land titles of the Indians are fully respected, and that said proposed legislation does not conflict with the Indian tribal organizations as secured to them by law, and that the Federal judiciary system is in no wise changed and that the work of the Dawes Commission and the various town-site commissions engaged in work of fulfilling treaty stipulations is in no wise interfered with, curtailed, or abridged; and

Whereas that said proposed legislation provides the necessary means by which more than 97,000 American children of school age in the rural district may have the benefit of free school education, the boon of every American citizen; and

Whereas said legislation furnishes a complete and adequate system of government for the 400,000 intelligent, industrious, enterprising, law-abiding, and patriotic American citizens residing in Indian Territory: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the people of the town of Krebs, Ind. T., in mass meeting duly called and assembled, do hereby approve and indorse said proposed legislation known as the Moon bill and earnestly ask and petition Congress to enact the same into law as early as possible in its present form.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be forwarded to each member of the Committee on Territories of the United States Senate and House of Representatives, and that a copy be furnished to the press for publication.

W. G. OGLESBY, Chairman.
TAL MILLWEE, Secretary.

MASS MEETING AT ALLEN.

Whereas Congressman J. A. MOON, of Tennessee, has introduced in the Congress of the United States a bill providing a Territorial form of government for the Indian Territory; and said Territorial government, we consider, is adapted to the needs of the people and the Commonwealth generally:

Resolved, That we, the citizens of Allen, Ind. T., in mass meeting assembled, do heartily petition and most humbly invoke the Congress of the United States that they pass the Moon bill without amendment.

Mr. SHATTUC. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DALZELL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BOUTELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12199) to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States, and had come to no resolution thereon.

THE "MORALS OF JESUS OF NAZARETH."

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), Whereas it has been ascertained that the authorities of the National Museum Library have expressed their willingness to permit private parties to publish the volume in said library known as the "Morals of Jesus of Nazareth," by Thomas Jefferson, and that private publishers have expressed their purpose to do so, House concurrent resolution No. 15 of the present Congress is hereby rescinded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to have the gentleman explain the purpose of the resolution.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, at the request of a good many persons interested in the publication, I introduced the resolution which passed here the other day. Subsequent arrangements have been made by which this book will be published privately, and therefore there is no necessity for its publication by Congress.

Mr. WARNOCK. This is to be done without expense to the Government?

Mr. LACEY. Without expense to the Government. That being the case, I simply ask to have the former resolution rescinded.

Mr. SHATTUC. Do we become responsible for its publication?

Mr. LACEY. Not at all. We simply withdraw this resolution, and private parties will publish it without any expense to the Government.

Mr. BALL of Texas. That is true of pretty nearly all the publications that we distribute, is it not, that private parties would publish them?

Mr. LACEY. The reason this was offered was because Congress had the control of the manuscripts in that collection, and this book not having been published, and some of the other manuscripts having been published, it was thought Congress ought to authorize this publication, as it had authorized the others; but as it will be published in any event, even if Congress has it printed, we might as well save the expense and let it be published by private parties.

Mr. BALL of Texas. If that is the purpose of this resolution, I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made?

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. SCARBOROUGH, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. CALDERHEAD, for fifteen days, on account of important business.

And then, on motion of Mr. SHATTUC (at 5 o'clock p. m.), the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communication was taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting a copy of the findings filed by the court in the case of James W. Vaughan, administrator of estate of Turner Vaughan, against the United States—to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 4776) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Emory River, in the State of Tennessee, by the Tennessee Central Railway or its successors, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2162); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. FLETCHER, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 5434) to authorize the city of Little Falls, Minn., to construct a wagon and foot bridge across the Mississippi River within the limits of said city, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2163); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. JONES of Washington, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 4204) relating to grants of land to the Territory and State of Washington for school purposes, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 2164); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. NEEDHAM, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14511) to authorize the relinquishment to the United States of patented lands and claims, and so forth, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2165); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MONDELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14280) providing for national trophy and prizes for rifle competition, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 2168); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DAVIS of Florida, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14380) to authorize the construction of a bridge across Waccamaw River, at Conway, in the State of South Carolina, by Conway and Seashore Railroad Company, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 2169); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. REID, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 7864) to pay John F. Lawson $237.96, balance due him for services as United States mail carrier, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2159); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. DEEMER, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 4766) granting an increase of pension to James P. McClure, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2160); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GRAFF, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 4306) for the relief of Edward Haines, John Haugland, Wallace L. Reed, W. D. Davis, Martin Monson, Johann Bottjer, and the legal representatives of J. P. Ferwerda, deceased, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 2161); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Under clause 2, Rule XIII, adverse reports were delivered to the Clerk, and laid on the table, as follows:

Mr. HULL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13790) relating to the San Francisco and Piedmont Railway, a railroad corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, and granting to said corporation the right to use for terminal purposes a part or portion of Yerba Buena or Goat Island, in the Bay of San Francisco, California, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 2166); which said bill and report were laid on the table.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 8191) relating to the San Francisco and Piedmont Railway, a railroad corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, and granting to said corporation the right to use for terminal purposes a part or portion of Yerba Buena or Goat Island, in the Bay of San Francisco, California, reported the same adversely, accompanied by a report (No. 2167); which said bill and report were laid on the table.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials of the following titles were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. OVERSTREET: A bill (H. R. 14622) to establish a fish-hatching and fish station in the State of Indiana—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. HENRY of Connecticut: A bill (H. R. 14623) to establish a division in the Department of Agriculture for the study of the criminal, pauper, and defective classes and the influence of agricultural life upon them—to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. HOPKINS: A bill (H. R. 14643) to provide for the taking of a census of agricultural statistics in the year 1905 and every tenth year thereafter—to the Select Committee on the Census.

By Mr. RAY of New York: A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 194) providing for the printing of the constitutions of the several States with marginal notes and index—to the Committee on Printing.

By Mr. HEPBURN: A resolution (H. Res. 266) providing for a new rule of the House of Representatives—to the Committee on Rules.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were introduced and severally referred, as follows:

By Mr. ACHESON: A bill (H. R. 14624) for the relief of Louis R. Newlands—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. ALLEN of Kentucky: A bill (H. R. 14625) granting an increase of pension to William H. Castlen, of the Mexican war, now a pensioner under certificate No. 338—to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLAYTON: A bill (H. R. 14626) for the relief of Mrs. L. E. Boatwright—to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 14627) for the relief of the representatives of the estate of Reuben Dawkins, deceased—to the Committee on War Claims.

By Mr. COOMBS: A bill (H. R. 14628) granting a pension to Timothy Hanlon—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, May 22, 1902.

Prayer by Rev. F. J. PRETTYMAN, of the city of Washington.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. SCOTT, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation granting pensions to officers and enlisted men of the Life-Saving Service; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of sundry ex-Union soldiers, inmates of the Soldiers' Home of California, praying for the enactment of legislation granting per diem service pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CLAPP presented a petition of Duluth Division, No. 336, Order of Railway Conductors, of Duluth, Minn., praying for the passage of the so-called Hoar anti-injunction bill, to limit the meaning of the word "conspiracy" and the use of "restraining orders and injunctions" in certain cases, and remonstrating against the passage of any substitute therefor; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I present a concurrent resolution of the legislature of Iowa, relative to the enactment of legislation to finally adjust the swamp-land grants. I ask that the concurrent resolution be read and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The concurrent resolution was read and referred to the Committee on Public Lands, as follows:

CONCURRENT RESOLUTION.

Be it resolved by the house of representatives of the State of Iowa (the senate concurring), That,

Whereas the act of Congress of September 28, 1850, granted to the State of Iowa and other States all swamp lands situated within the several States; and

Whereas the second section of said act directed the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw from sale the swamp lands within said States and to furnish the governors of said States a list of said swamp lands; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Interior failed to comply with the requirements of said law and proceeded thereafter to sell a great amount of land that was swamp and overflowed land, and under such sales the United States caused patent to issue for said lands; and

Whereas the State of Iowa was thereby deprived of title to a great amount of land that was swamp and overflowed land, and which had been granted to said State by the aforesaid act of Congress; and

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States a bill entitled "A bill to finally adjust the swamp-land grant, and for other purposes," said bill being H. R. 8325; and

Whereas said bill provides for the adjustment of the swamp-land grant, directing the Secretary of the Interior of the United States Government to refund the money received by the Government of the United States for the sale of swamp and overflowed lands to the State of Iowa and other States; and

Whereas the several counties of the State of Iowa have claims filed with the Secretary of the Interior against the Government of the United States for the purchase price of various tracts of swamp lands sold and patented by the Government of the United States, which claims could be fully adjusted under said bill now pending before the Congress of the United States: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the legislature of the State of Iowa, That the United States Senators and Representatives from the State of Iowa are respectfully and earnestly requested and urged to use all honorable means to secure the passage and enactment in a law of the bill now pending before the House of Representatives of the United States, being designated H. R. 8325. Be it further

Resolved, That the governor of the State of Iowa is hereby requested to cause a copy of this concurrent resolution to be furnished to the United States Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of Iowa.

Mr. DOLLIVER presented a petition of Robert Jackson Post, No. 192, Department of Iowa, Grand Army of the Republic, of Corydon, Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation to modify and simplify the pension laws of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Iowa State Retail Grocers' Association, of Des Moines, Iowa, praying for the repeal of the national bankruptcy law, or to so amend it as to better protect the retail merchant against his debtors; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Iowa State Retail Grocers' Association, of Des Moines, Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the use of trading stamps, checks, and other gift enterprises; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of Federal Labor Union, No. 4146, American Federation of Labor, of Boone, Iowa, praying for the enactment of legislation providing an educational test for immigrants to this country; which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented resolutions of the Turnvereins of Holstein, Waterloo, Elkader, Ottumwa, and Guttenberg, all in the State of Iowa, expressing sympathy with the people of the South African Republic and the Orange Free State; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented petitions of Lodge No. 104, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Moulton; of Lodge No. 520, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Council Bluffs; of Local Division No. 117, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Mason City; of Local Division No. 203, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Perry; of Lodge No. 86, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Perry; of Local Division No. 211, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Junction City; of Lodge No. 138, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Boynton; of Lodge No. 183, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Clinton, and of Lodge No. 311, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, of Belle Plains, all in the State of Iowa, praying for the passage of the so-called Hoar anti-injunction bill, to limit the meaning of the word "conspiracy" and the use of "restraining orders and injunctions" in certain cases, and remonstrating against the passage of any substitute therefor; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. BLACKBURN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Kentucky, praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the internal-revenue laws relative to the tax on distilled spirits; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PLATT of New York presented petitions of the Social Reform Club of New York City; of the Citizens' Union of the Twentieth assembly district of Kings County, Brooklyn; of the Republican Club of the Twenty-sixth assembly district, of New York City, and of the Chamber of Commerce of Troy, all in the State of New York, praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the compensation of letter carriers; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. FAIRBANKS presented a petition of the Prohibition State Central Committee of Indianapolis, Ind., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the so-called anti-canteen law; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Fort Wayne Encampment, Union Veteran Legion, of Fort Wayne, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation granting per-diem service pensions; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented petitions of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Jonesboro, Ind., of the congregation of the Trinity Methodist Episcopal Church, of West Brighton, N. Y., and of the Woman's Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Delaware, Ohio, praying for the enactment of legislation to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors in immigrant stations; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. SCOTT presented a petition of Ashton Division, No. 186, Order of Railway Conductors, of Huntington, W. Va., praying for the passage of the so-called Hoar anti-injunction bill, to limit the meaning of the word "conspiracy" and the use of "restraining orders and injunctions" in certain cases, and remonstrating against the passage of any substitute therefor; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KEARNS presented a petition of Hall of Division No. 124, Order of Railway Conductors, of Ogden, Utah, praying for the passage of the so-called Hoar anti-injunction bill, to limit the meaning of the word "conspiracy," and the use of "restraining orders and injunctions" in certain cases, and remonstrating against the passage of any substitute therefor; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DEPEW presented a petition of the National Afro-American Council, praying for the creating of a commission to inquire into the condition of the colored people of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Citizens' Union of the Twentieth assembly district of Kings County, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the salaries of letter carriers; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. HALE (for Mr. FRYE) presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Thomaston, Me., praying for the enactment of legislation granting pensions to officers and enlisted men of the Life-Saving Service; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PLATT of New York, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. 679) directing the issue of a check in lieu of a lost check drawn by Capt. E. O. REPORTS OF GETTYSBURG NATIONAL PARK COMMISSION.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom were referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. R. 46) to provide for the printing of 6,000 copies of the consolidated reports of the Gettysburg National Park Commission, 1893 to 1901, inclusive, to report them back and move concurrence.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT of Connecticut). The amendments will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 3, before the word "thousand," strike out the word "six" and in lieu thereof insert the word "five;"

In line 6, before the word "thousand," strike out "two" and insert in lieu thereof "one;" and

Amend the title so as to read: "A joint resolution to provide for the printing of 5,000 copies of the consolidated reports of the Gettysburg National Park Commission, 1893 to 1901, inclusive."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

BINDING AND DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC DOCUMENTS.

Mr. PLATT of New York. I am directed by the Committee on Printing to report a joint resolution provididing for the binding and distribution of public documents held in the custody of the superintendent of documents, unbound, upon orders of Senators, etc., and I ask for its present consideration.

The joint resolution (S. R. 103) providing for the binding and distribution of public documents held in the custody of the superintendent of documents, unbound, upon orders of Senators, Representatives, Delegates, and officers of Congress, when such documents are not called for within two years after printing, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That hereafter the documents reserved for binding upon orders of Senators, Representatives, Delegates, and officers of Congress, as provided in paragraph 6, section 54, of an act approved January 12, 1895, providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents, if not called for and delivered within two years after printing, shall be bound in first grades of cloth and delivered to the superintendent of documents for distribution to libraries; and the Public Printer is hereby authorized and directed to bind in cloth all such documents heretofore delivered to the superintendent of documents for like distribution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HOAR. I do not exactly understand the joint resolution. I understand that the documents which are to be delivered to Senators are bound in a particular way—in calf.

Mr. PLATT of New York. No; they are not bound at all. I will ask the Secretary to read a letter from the Public Printer on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The letter of the Public Printer will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

GOVERNMENT PRINTING OFFICE,
OFFICE OF THE PUBLIC PRINTER,
Washington, D. C., May 21, 1902.

Hon. T. C. PLATT,
Chairman Committee on Printing, United States Senate.

SIR: In accordance with provisions of paragraph 6 of section 54 of the act providing for the public printing and binding and the distribution of public documents, approved January 12, 1895, there have been delivered to the superintendent of documents about 175,000 volumes of the reserved documents. These documents are in loose sheets, tied in bundles. The superintendent of documents states that, in their present condition, they can not be distributed or sold. There are, therefore, only two methods of disposing of them; they must either be bound so they can be distributed to libraries, or condemned and sold as waste paper, as they should not be stored at great expense to the Government, as is now the case. It would appear to be almost a crime to dispose of them as waste paper when so many libraries desire them.

I have the honor to inclose herewith a draft of a bill providing for the binding and distribution of the documents which have been turned over to the superintendent of documents, as well as the binding of all such documents in the future, and have to request that, if it meets with your approval, you introduce it in the Senate and request its early consideration.

The estimated cost of binding the documents now on storage is $35,000.

Respectfully,

F. W. PALMER, Public Printer.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CHAMBLIN, DELANEY & SCOTT.

Mr. MARTIN. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 989) to authorize the Light-House Board to pay to Chamblin, Delaney & Scott the sum of $1,704.46, to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to pay to Messrs. Chamblin, Delaney & Scott, of Richmond, Va., $1,704.46 out of the appropriation for Marblehead light-house made by the Fifty-third Congress.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ASSISTANT CLERK TO COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. PROCTOR, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate is hereby authorized to appoint an assistant clerk at the compensation of $1,440 per annum, to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate, until otherwise provided by law.

AMENDMENTS TO BILLS.

Mr. CLARK of Montana submitted the following amendments, intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill; which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed:

An amendment proposing to increase the salary of the justices of the peace in the District of Columbia from $2,000 to $3,000;

An amendment proposing an appropriation to pay a justice of the peace designated to serve as judge of the police court $5 a day while so serving;

An amendment to strike out, on page 44, lines 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8, relative to the fees of notaries public; and

An amendment proposing to appropriate $275 each to justices of the peace acting as ad interim judges in the police court.

Mr. STEWART submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to contract with the Holland Torpedo Boat Company for 30 of its most improved type of submarine torpedo boats, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the naval appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHARTERS AND CONSTITUTIONS.

Mr. LODGE. I move that Senate Document No. 76, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session, being in the nature of a petition, praying for the publication of a new edition of charters, constitutions, and organic laws of the United States, with accompanying letters, be reprinted with corrections.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF THE NAVY.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed, at as early date as is practicable, to furnish to the Senate detailed items of all expenditures under the head of "Pay of the Navy," in the naval appropriation bill for the year ending June 30, 1902, said detailed statement to cover the separate expenditures under each item in said appropriation bill under the head of "Pay of the Navy."

CHANNELS AT NAVY-YARDS ON PACIFIC COAST.

Mr. HALE submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to furnish full information to the Senate respecting the depth of water at different places at low tide in the channel leading from the sea to the Mare Island Navy-Yard, and to state whether or not any first-class battle ship has ever been taken to said navy-yard, and also to furnish full information as to the depth of water near and about the navy-yard in Puget Sound.

EXPENDITURES OF NAVY DEPARTMENT IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, the resolutions which have just been adopted remind me that on the 17th day of April the Senate passed a resolution directing the Secretary of the Navy to report the expenditures of the Navy Department in the Philippines. That has been more than a month ago, and I should like to inquire if the resolution has yet been answered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is informed by the clerks that they have no memorandum of an answer to the resolution.

RENTAL OF BUILDINGS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, the Attorney-General, the Postmaster-General, the Secretary of the Navy, the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Civil Service Commission, and the Department of Labor are hereby directed to transmit to the Senate, at the earliest practicable day, detailed information concerning quarters rented by each of said departments and commissions, giving the location, area of floor space occupied, and the annual rental in each case.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. LODGE. If the morning business is concluded, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 2295.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I have something to say upon the pending bill. I will say it as briefly and as compactly as I may. We have to deal with a territory 10,000 miles away, 1,200 miles in extent, containing 10,000,000 people. A majority of the Senate think that people are under the American flag and lawfully subject to our authority. We are not at war with them or with anybody. The country is in a condition of profound peace as well as of unexampled prosperity. The world is in profound peace, except in one quarter, in South Africa, where a handful of republicans are fighting for their independence, and have been doing better fighting than has been done on the face of the earth since Thermopylæ, or certainly since Bannockburn.

Yet the Filipinos have a right to call it war. They claim to be a people and to be fighting for their rights as a people. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] admits that there is a people there, although he says they are not one people, but there are several. But we can not be at war under the Constitution without an act of Congress.

We are not at war. We made peace with Spain on the 14th day of February, 1899. Congress has never declared war with the people of the Philippine Islands. The President has never asserted nor usurped the power to do it. We are only doing on a large scale exactly what we have done at home within a few years past, where the military forces of the United States have been called out to suppress a riot or a tumult or a lawless assembly, too strong for the local authorities. You have the same right to administer the water torture, or to hang men by the thumbs, to extort confession, in one case as in the other, You have the same right to do it in Cleveland or Pittsburg or at Colorado Springs as you have to do it within the Philippine Islands. I have the same right as an American citizen or an American Senator to discuss the conduct of any military officer in the Philippine Islands that I have to discuss the conduct of a marshal or a constable or a captain in Pittsburg or in Cleveland if there were a labor riot there.

That duty I mean to perform to the best of my ability, fearlessly as becomes an American citizen, and honestly as becomes an American Senator.

But I have an anterior duty and an anterior right to talk about the action of the American Senate, both in the past and in the present, for which, as no man will deny, I have my full share of personal responsibility.

The Senator from Ohio, in his very brilliant and forcible speech, which I heard with delight and instruction, said that we were bound to restore order in the Philippine Islands, and we can not leave them till that should be done. He said we were bound to keep the faith we pledged to Spain in the treaty, and that we were bound, before we left, to see that secured. He said we were bound, especially, to look out for the safety of the Filipinos who had been our friends, and that we could not, in honor, depart until that should be made secure.

All that, Mr. President, is true. So far as I know, no man has doubted it. But these things are not what we are fighting for; not one of them. There never was a time when, if we had declared that we only were there to keep faith with Spain, and that we only were there to restore order, that we were only there to see that no friend of ours should suffer at the hands of any enemy of ours, that the war would not have ended in that moment.

You are fighting for sovereignty. You are fighting for the principle of eternal dominion over that people, and that is the only question in issue in the conflict. We said in the case of Cuba that she had a right to be free and independent. We affirmed in the Teller resolution, I think without a negative voice, that we would not invade that right and would not meddle with her territory or anything that belonged to her. That declaration was a declaration of peace as well as of righteousness; and we made the treaty, so far as concerned Cuba, and conducted the war and have conducted ourselves ever since on that theory—that we had no right to interfere with her independence; that we had no right to her territory or to anything that was Cuba's. So we only demanded in the treaty that Spain should hereafter let her alone. If you had done to Cuba as you have done to the Philippine Islands, who had exactly the same right, you would be at this moment, in Cuba, just where Spain was when she excited the indignation of the civilized world and we compelled her to let go. And if you had done in the Philippines as you did in Cuba, you would be to-day or would soon be in those islands as you are in Cuba.

But you made a totally different declaration about the Philippine Islands. You undertook in the treaty to acquire sovereignty over her for yourself, which that people denied. You declared not only in the treaty, but in many public utterances in this Chamber and elsewhere, that you had a right to buy sovereignty with money, or to treat it as the spoils of war or the booty of battle. The moment you made that declaration the Filipino people gave you notice that they treated it as a declaration of war. So your generals reported, and so Aguinaldo expressly declared. The President sent out an order to take forcible possession, by military power, of those islands. General Otis tried to suppress it, but it leaked out at Iloilo through General Miller. General Otis tried to suppress it and substitute that they should have all the rights of the most favored provinces. He stated that he did that because he knew the proclamation would bring on war. And the next day Aguinaldo covered the walls of Manila with a proclamation stating what President McKinley had done, and saying that if that were persisted in he and his people would fight, and General MacArthur testified that Aguinaldo represented the entire people. So you deliberately made up the issue for a fight for dominion on one side and a fight for liberty on the other.

Then when you had ratified the treaty you voted down the resolution in the Senate, known as the Bacon resolution, declaring the right of that people to independence, and you passed the McEnery resolution, which declared that you meant to dispose of those islands as should be for the interest of the United States. That was the origin of the war, if it be war. That is what the war is all about, if it be war; and it is idle for my brilliant and ingenious friend from Ohio to undertake to divert this issue to a contest on our part to enable us to keep faith with our friends among the Filipinos, or to restore order there, or to carry out the provisions of the treaty with Spain.

Now, Mr. President, when you determined to resort to force for that purpose, you took upon yourself every natural consequence of that condition. The natural result of a conflict of arms between a people coming out of subjection and a highly civilized people—one weak and the other strong, with all the powers and resources of civilization—is inevitably, as everybody knows, that there will be cruelty on one side and retaliation by cruelty on the other. You knew it even before it happened, as well as you know it now that it has happened; and the responsibility is yours.

If, in a conflict between a people fighting for independence and liberty, being a weak people, and a people striving to deprive them of their independence and liberty, being a strong people, always, if the nature of man remains unchanged, the war is converted in the end into a conflict in which bushwhacking, treachery, and cruelty have to be encountered, the responsibility is with the men who made the war. Conflicts between white races and brown races or red races or black races, between superior races and inferior races, are always cruel on both sides, and the men who decree with full notice that such conflict shall take place are the men on whom the responsibility rests. When Aguinaldo said he did not desire the conflict to go on, and that it went on against his wish, he was told by our general that he would not parley with him without total submission. My friend from Wisconsin declared in the Senate that we would have no talk with men with arms in their hands, whether we were right or wrong. The responsibility of everything that has happened since, which he must have foreseen if he knew anything of history and human nature, rests upon him and the men who acted with him.

We can not get rid of this one fact, we can not escape it, and we can not flinch from it. You chose war instead of peace. You chose force instead of conciliation, with full notice that everything that has happened since would happen as a consequence of your decision. Had you made a declaration to Aguinaldo that you would respect their title to independence, and that all you desired was order and to fulfill the treaty and to protect your friends, you would have disarmed that people in a moment. I believe there never has been a time since when a like declaration made by this Chamber alone, but certainly made by this Chamber and the other House, with the approval of the President, would not have ended this conflict and prevented all these horrors.

Instead of that gentlemen talked of the wealth of the Philippine Islands, and about the advantage to our trade. They sought to dazzle our eyes with nuggets of other men's gold. Senators declared in the Senate Chamber and on the hustings that the flag never shall be hauled down in the Philippine Islands, and those of you who think otherwise keep silent and enter no disclaimer. The Senator from Ohio says our policy has not been in the dark, but it has been a policy published to the world. Has it? Has it? I want to ask, What was it which created the war, which keeps it up, and which created and keeps up the hatred, and will make war break out again and again for centuries to come, unless human nature be changed or be different in their bosoms from what it is in ours? It is because our policy has not been published to the world. It is because you keep a padlock on your lips.

This debate for the last three years has contained many audacities. One thing, however, no Senator has been audacious enough to affirm, and that is that if he were a Filipino, as he is an American, he would not do exactly, saving only acts of cruelty, as the Filipino has done.

I find myself beset with one difficulty whenever I undertake to debate this question. I am to discuss and denounce what seems to me one of the most foolish and wicked chapters in history. Yet I am compelled to admit that the men who are responsible for it are neither foolish nor wicked. On the contrary, there are no men on the face of the earth with whom on nearly all other subjects I am in general more in accord, to whose sound judgment or practical sagacity I am more willing to defer, or to whose patriotism or humanity I am more willing to commit the honor or the fate of the Republic.

It may be that it is presumption to act on my own judgment against that of my valued and beloved political friends. But we do not settle questions of righteousness or justice on any man's authority. Still less do we settle them by a show of hands. Each man is responsible only to his own conscience, which is the only authority he must obey. Besides, Mr. President, I have on my side in this great debate the fathers of the Republic, the statesmen who adorned its first century, the founders of the Republican party, every one of whom declared and lived by and died by the doctrine you are now repudiating. I have also your own authority, your own declaration, made only three years ago, at the beginning of the Spanish war. When you declared that Cuba of right—of right—ought to be a free and independent State, and that the United States would not acquire her territory as the result of the war with Spain, you settled as a matter of duty and of justice this whole Philippine question.

I have, however, at least, to congratulate my friends who differ from me on an increased sobriety in dealing with this matter.

We are not flourishing nuggets of gold in the Senate just now. The devil imperialism is not promising us all the kingdoms of this world and the glory thereof, if we will fall down and worship him. You have just hauled down the American flag in China where it once floated, and you have just hauled it down day before yesterday in Cuba where it has floated for three years.

For the words, "interests of the United States," which the McEnery resolution declared were to determine our actions in governing these islands, you substitute in this bill the declaration that "the rights acquired in the Philippine Islands under the treaty with Spain are to be administered for the benefit of the inhabitants of those islands."

SEC. 10. That all the property and rights which may have been acquired in the Philippine Islands by the United States under the treaty of peace with Spain, 1898, are hereby placed under the control of the government of the Philippine Islands, to be administered for the benefit of inhabitants of the islands.

SEC. 7. There are to be municipal and provincial governments as far and as fast as the governments are capable, fit, and ready for the same, with popular representative government.

The share to which you propose to admit these people in your scheme of government, is an admission that a large number of them are fit for self-government. You propose for them—to take effect in the near future—a constitution, not very different from that of Canada, where the Crown of England appoints the Governor-General, and the Governor-General appoints the senate, and there is a veto on every provincial law by the Governor-General, and a veto on every law of the Canadian congress, not only by the Governor-General, but by the Government at home.

The Senator from New Hampshire called a witness the other day to the effect that every Filipino would take a bribe. Sir Robert Walpole said that of England. I acquit the majority of the Senate and the committee who report this bill from believing the charge made by my honorable friend from New Hampshire. They affirm that there are many Filipinos who are sincerely our friends. They admit, if I understand them, that there are in those islands many citizens accomplished and well educated, lawyers and merchants, conducting large affairs in trade, and they themselves propose to commit to these people at once, as soon as may be, large powers of government, retaining for us little more than the power of a veto.

What you have been fighting for all this time as your right, if you expect to enact this bill into law and to carry it out in practice, is to substitute a constitution of your making for one of their making; to have a dependency, which is what you want, instead of a republic, which is what they want; to have fitness for the elective franchise determined by an authority which has its source 10,000 miles away, instead of with the people at home; and to deny them independence, even if they are fit for it, so long as you please, without any regard to their desire.

This investigation, I suppose, is yet upon the threshold. Your chief witnesses, so far, have been soldiers and governors who are committed to policies of subjugation. The investigation has been conducted by a committee of that way of thinking.

Yet we have got already some pregnant admissions, and some remarkable facts have already come to light. Governor Taft, if I understood him, concedes that nothing so far indicates that the existing policy has been good for the United States. It is only the benefit of the people of the Philippine Islands, in saving them from anarchy, or from foreign nations, in establishing schools for them, that vindicates what you have done so far. What you have done so far has been to get some few thousand children actually at school in the whole Philippine dominion. To get this result, you have certainly slain many times that number of parents.

It would be without avail to repeat in the Senate to-day what was said at the time of the Spanish treaty, and afterwards when you determined to reduce the Philippine people by force to submission.

What your fathers said when they founded the Republic; the declarations of the great leaders of every generation; our century of glorious history, were appealed to in vain. Their lessons fell upon the ears of men dazzled by military glory and delirious with the lust of conquest. I will not repeat them now. My desire to-day is simply to call attention to the practical working of the two doctrines—the doctrine of buying sovereignty or conquering it in battle, and the doctrine of the Declaration of Independence. For the last three years you have put one of them in force in Cuba and the other in the Philippine Islands. I ask you to think soberly which method, on the whole, you like better. I ask you to compare the cost of war with the cost of peace, of justice with that of injustice, the cost of empire with the cost of republican liberty, the cost of the way of America and the way of Europe, of the doctrine of the Declaration of Independence with the doctrine of the Holy Alliance. You have tried both, I hope, to your heart's content. But before I do that I want to call attention to one important fact in our history not generally known. It is very interesting in its connection with this debate.

John Quincy Adams, as everybody knows, was the father of what we call the Monroe doctrine. He secured its adoption through the weight of his great influence, by a hesitating President, and a reluctant Cabinet. It is not so well known that he placed the Monroe doctrine solely upon the doctrine that just governments must rest upon the consent of the governed. That, he declared to be its only foundation, and that so founded it rested upon the eternal principle of righteousness and justice.

A thorough examination has lately been made by an accomplished historical scholar, Mr. Worthington C. Ford, aided by Mr. Charles Francis Adams, grandson of John Quincy Adams, of the unpublished Adams manuscripts at Quincy, the archives of the Department of State, and the papers of President Monroe, lately published by Congress.

I can relate this story in a moment. I think it an important contribution to this debate.

Mr. President, I discussed some time ago, and more than once, this attempt to buy sovereignty with money of a dispossessed tyrant, or to get it as booty or spoils of battle. I showed that it is in contradiction of the great American doctrine that just governments rest only on the consent of the governed—in flat contradiction of the doctrine on which this Government is founded and of the uniform tradition of all our statesmen from 1776 to the adoption of the Spanish treaty. I do not mean to repeat that argument now. It was met by the affirmation that Jefferson disregarded it when we bought Louisiana, and that John Quincy Adams disregarded it when we acquired Florida, and that Abraham Lincoln disregarded it when he put down the rebellion, and that Charles Sumner disregarded it when he urged the purchase of Alaska.

It was never denied that we could acquire territory and that we could govern it after it was acquired. The doctrine was that if the territory be inhabited by that vital and living being we call a people, as distinct from a few scattered and unorganized inhabitants, neither controlling it nor governing themselves, that people have a right to govern themselves and to determine their own destiny after their own fashion. This is the American exposition of the law of nations. Thomas Jefferson never departed from it. He regarded the Louisiana Territory as something not worth taking. He declared that it would not be inhabited for a thousand years. He only wanted New Orleans. The rest of the Territory was forced upon him by Napoleon. There was no people, in the sense of the law of nations, either in New Orleans or in the Louisiana Territory. There was no people there that could make a government or a treaty.

Abraham Lincoln put down the rebellion, because by his and our interpretation of the Constitution we were one people and not two—to which doctrine the Southern people had consented when they adopted the Constitution; and besides, if you had counted the whole people, black and white, there was never a majority on the side of secession in any single Southern State. Sumner again and again declared that there was nothing in Alaska which could be called a people, and that if there were the United States would never be willing to acquire them without their consent; and that we would never take Canada, if we could get it, except with the full approbation of her people. If my friends of the press or in the Senate who still stick to this ten hundred times refuted fallacy are not content, they will never be persuaded, though Thomas Jefferson and John Quincy Adams and Abraham Lincoln and Charles Sumner rise from the dead.

I do not wish to detain the Senate by renewing that debate. But I wish to cite a chapter of the history of this country, which shows that your present policy is in contradiction of the Monroe doctrine, as it is in contradiction of the Declaration of Independence. It is well known that John Quincy Adams was the author of the Monroe doctrine. He carried his point over the opposition of the Cabinet and reluctance on the part of the President.

When Canning proposed that the United States join England in asserting that the Holy Alliance should not reduce any South American country under the dominion of Spain, Mr. Adams said that we would not join England, although she asked us to do it. He said we were not to be a little cockboat in the wake of the British man-of-war. He counseled the President, and his advice was taken, that this country should make its declaration to Russia, the head and strength of the Holy Alliance, and he put that declaration expressly and solely on the doctrine of the consent of the governed, affirmed in our Declaration of Independence. He declared that doctrine was a doctrine of absolute right and righteousness.

It will take but a moment to tell the story as it appears in the archives in our Department of State, in the Monroe papers lately published, in Adams's Diary, and in the Adams manuscripts at Quincy, which have been made public within a few days.

In August, September, and October, 1823, there came to the State Department of Washington from Mr. Rush dispatches containing letters from Mr. Canning. These letters suggested designs of the Holy Alliance against the independence of the South American colonies, and proposed cooperation between Great Britain and the United States against that alliance.

President Monroe asked the advice of Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Madison, and suggested that we should make it known that we should view an attack by the European powers upon the colonies of Spain as an attack upon ourselves. But in the meantime the Russian minister, Baron Tuyll, on the 16th of October, communicated to the Secretary of State a declaration of the Emperor of Russia that the political principles of that Power would not permit him to recognize the independence of the revolted colonies of Spain.

Mr. Adams saw and seized his opportunity. He gave this advice to President Monroe, as appears by his diary, on November 7, 1823:

I remarked that the communications recently received from the Russian minister, Baron Tuyll, afforded, as I thought, a very suitable and convenient opportunity for us to take our stand against the Holy Alliance, and at the same time decline the overtures of Great Britain. It would be more candid and more dignified to avow our principles explicitly to Baron Tuyll than to go in as a cockboat in the wake of the British man-of-war. This idea was acquiesced in on all sides.

At the Cabinet meeting of November 15, 1823, the subject was again discussed.

Letters were read from Mr. Jefferson, who was for acceding to the pending proposal. Mr. Madison was less decisively pronounced, but thought the movement on the part of Great Britain impelled more by her interest than by a principle of general liberty. President Monroe was quite despondent.

Adams proceeds:

I soon found the source of the President's despondency with regard to South American affairs. Calhoun is perfectly moonstruck by the surrender of Cadiz, and says the Holy Allies, with 10,000 men, will restore all Mexico and all South America to the Spanish dominion. I did not deny that they might make a temporary impression for three, four, or five years, but I no more believe that the Holy Allies will restore the Spanish dominion upon the American continent than that Chimborazo will sink beneath the ocean. But, I added, if the South Americans were really in a state to be so easily subdued, it would be but a more forcible motive for us to beware of involving ourselves in their fate. I set this down as one of Calhoun's extravaganzas. He is for plunging into a war to prevent that which, if his opinion of it is correct, we are utterly unable to prevent. He is for embarking our lives and fortunes in a ship which he declares the very rats have abandoned. Calhoun reverts again to his idea of giving discretionary power to our minister to accede to all Canning's proposals, if necessary, but not otherwise. After much discussion, I said I thought we should bring the whole answer to Mr. Canning's proposals to a test of right and wrong. Considering the South Americans as independent nations, they themselves, and no other nation, had the right to dispose of their condition. We have no right to dispose of them, either alone or in conjunction with other nations. Neither have any other nations the right of disposing of them without their consent. This principle will give us a clue to answer all Mr. Canning's questions with candor and confidence, and I am to draft a dispatch accordingly. (Adams's Memoirs, p. 186.)

Before Mr. Adams prepared the draft, two more dispatches were received from Rush, dated the 2d and 10th of October, indicating a decided change in Canning's tone, and almost an indifference on his part to pursue his project of united action. Meantime, there came a new communication from Russia, which gave Adams his opportunity. He put his reply on the express and impregnable ground of the consent of the governed, as declared in our Declaration of Independence. On the 25th of November, he made, for the President's use, a draft of observations upon the communications recently received from the Russian minister. The paper begins as follows:

The Government of the United States of America is essentially republican. By their Constitution it is provided that "the United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect them from invasion."

The principles of this polity are: 1. That the institution of government to be lawful, must be pacific, that is, founded upon the consent and by the agreement of those who are governed; and 2, that each nation is exclusively the judge of the government best suited to itself, and that no other nation can justly interfere by force to impose a different government upon it. The first of the principles may be designated as the principle of liberty, the second as the principle of national independence; they are both principles of peace and of good will to men.

A necessary consequence of the second of these principles is that the United States recognize in other nations the right which they claim and exercise for themselves of establishing and modifying their own governments, according to their own judgments and views of their interests, not encroaching upon the rights of others. (Ford, p. 38.)

Mr. Adams states later in the same document:

In the general declarations that the allied monarchs will never compound and never will even treat with th revolution, and that their policy has only for its object by forcible interposition to guarantee the tranquillity of all the States of which the civilized world is composed, the President wishes to perceive the sentiments, the application of which is limited, and intended in their results to be limited to the affairs of Europe. (Ford, p. 40.)

Mr. Monroe and Mr. Calhoun hesitated in regard to the insertion of this paragraph in the answer to Russia, but neither of them, as appears from the full narrative in Mr. Adams's diary, objected to the doctrine. They thought it might be offensive to Russia. Accordingly Mr. Adams read the paper to Baron Tuyll, omitting that paragraph, but received a letter from the President a little later, yielding his objections and consenting to its retention.

Mr. Worthington C. Ford, in an interesting paper contained in the Proceedings of the Massachusetts Historical Society for January, 1902, narrates the whole story, and says in conclusion:

That the timidity of the President was awakened, that record shows; but the persistence of Adams and the very weighty arguments he advanced in its favor induced Monroe to yield, but not until it was too late for the purpose intended. (Ford, p. 40.)

Mr. Ford adds, after citing the Russian minister's communication:

This gave Adams his opening. If the Emperor set up to be the mouthpiece of Divine Providence it would be well to intimate that this country did not recognize the language spoken and had a destiny of its own, also under the guidance of Divine Providence. If Alexander could exploit his political principles, those of a brutal repressive policy, the United States could show that another system of government, remote and separate from European traditions and administration, could give rise to a new and more active political principle—the consent of the governed—between which and the Emperor there could not exist even a sentimental sympathy. (Ford, p. 15.)

So, Mr. President, if you have your own way, and keep on in the path you are treading, you have not only repealed the Declaration of Independence, but you have left for the Monroe doctrine only the principle of brutal selfishness. You have taken from that doctrine, which is the chief glory of this country, from the time of the treaty of peace in 1783 till the inauguration of Abraham Lincoln in 1861, its foundation in righteousness and freedom, and you found it only upon selfishness. You say not that it is right, but only that it is for our interest. If hereafter you go to war for it—if you have your way—it will not be for the glory of the liberator or for the principle on which the Republic is founded. You will only have Ancient Pistol's solace:

I shall sutler be unto the camp,
And profits will accrue.

John Quincy Adams lived to see the great doctrine he had been taught from his cradle, which he had drawn in with his mother's milk, derided and trampled under foot by a people drunk with conquest and dazzled by military glory. He lived to see the President take soldiers and not statesmen for his counselors. He lived to see slavery entrenched in every department of the Government—in the White Hous e, in court, in Congress, in trade, and in the pulpit. But he never wavered nor faltered in his sublime faith. He faced the stormy and turbulent waves of the House of Representatives at eighty. He took for his motto: Alteri Seculo—a motto which his son inscribed at his burial place at Quincy.

But the new age came sooner even than the faith of John Quincy Adams had predicted. In less than thirteen years from his death, Abraham Lincoln, whom the people sent to the White House, had declared on his way thither the sublime doctrine of the consent of the governed to be that on which the Republic is founded, and for which, if need be, he was willing to be assassinated. I think, therefore, modestly I hope and humbly, that the men who differ from their political associates, and even from majorities, may find something of consolation and something of hope in the company of John Quincy Adams and in the company of Abraham Lincoln.

When we ratified the treaty of Paris we committed ourselves to one experiment in Cuba and another in the Philippine Islands. We had said already that Cuba of right ought to be free and independent. So when in the treaty Spain abandoned her sovereignty the title of Cuba became at once complete. We were only to stay there to keep order until we could hand over Cuba to a government her people had chosen and established.

By the same treaty we bought the Philippine Islands for $20,000,000 and declared and agreed that Congress shall dispose of them. So, according to those who held that treaty valid, it became the duty of the President to reduce them to submission, and of Congress to govern them.

Here the two doctrines are brought into sharp antagonism.

In Cuba, of right, just government, according to you, must rest on the consent of the governed. Her people are to "institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

In the Philippine Islands a government is to be instituted by a power 10,000 miles away, to be in the beginning a despotism, established by military power.

It is to be a despotism where there is treason without an overt act and elections, if they have them, without political debate, and schools where they can not teach liberty. It is to be established by military power, and to be such, to use the language of the McEnery resolution, such as shall seem "for the interest of the United States."

You have given both doctrines a three years' trial. Three years is sometimes a very long time and sometimes a very short time in human affairs. I believe the whole life of the Savior, after He first made His divine mission known, lasted but three years. Three years has wrought a mighty change in Cuba, and it has wrought a mighty change in the Philippine Islands. We have had plenty of time to try both experiments.

President Roosevelt a day or two ago very truly and eloquently recited the story of what we had done for Cuba, and claimed, and surely he was right, that it was one of the chief glories of the Republic in all our glorious history. When he had finished the recital he said, "That is one deed consummated to-day; and now for the other." I do not believe that brave and honest man will content himself to match this glorious instance of self-denial and good faith, which has so stirred his enthusiasm, by putting against it the gift of $200,000 from the Treasury to relieve suffering Martinique, a gift which, in proportion to our resources, is as if a man with $60,000 had given a two-dollar bill. There can be but one other deed which his Administration can do which can match the glories of the liberation of Cuba, and that will be the liberation of the Philippine Islands.

Now, what has each cost you, and what has each profited you?

In stating this account of profit and loss I hardly know which to take up first, principles and honor or material interests—I should have known very well which to have taken up first down to three years ago—what you call the sentimental, the ideal, the historical on the right side of the column; the cost or the profit in honor or shame and in character and in principle and moral influence, in true national glory; or the practical side, the cost in money and gain, in life and health, in wasted labor, in diminished national strength, or in prospects of trade and money getting.

I should naturally begin where our fathers used to begin. But somehow the things get so inextricably blended that we can not keep them separate. This world is so made that you can not keep honesty, and sound policy, and freedom, and material property, and good government, and the consent of the governed, apart. Men who undertake to make money by cheating pay for it by failure in business. If you try to keep order by military despotism you suffer from it by revolution and by barbarity in war. If a strong people try to govern a weak one against its will, the home government will get despotic, too. You can not maintain despotism in Asia and a republic in America. If you try to deprive even a savage or a barbarian of his just rights you can never do it without becoming a savage or a barbarian yourself.

Gentlemen talk about sentimentalities, about idealism. They like practical statesmanship better. But, Mr. President, this whole debate for the last four years has been a debate between two kinds of sentimentality. There has been practical statesmanship in plenty on both sides. Your side have carried their sentimentalities and ideals out in your practical statesmanship. The other side have tried and begged to be allowed to carry theirs out in practical statesmanship also. On one side have been these sentimentalities. They were the ideals of the fathers of the Revolutionary time, and from their day down till the day of Abraham Lincoln and Charles Sumner was over. The sentimentalities were that all men in political right were created equal; that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and are instituted to secure that equality; that every people—not every scattering neighborhood or settlement without organic life, not every portion of a people who may be temporarily discontented, but the political being that we call a people—has the right to institute a government for itself and to lay its foundation on such principles and organize its powers in such form as to it and not to any other people shall seem most likely to effect its safety and happiness. Now, a good deal of practical statesmanship has followed from these ideals and sentimentalities. They have builded forty-five States on firm foundations. They have covered South America with republics. They have kept despotism out of the Western Hemisphere. They have made the United States the freest, strongest, richest of the nations of the world. They have made the word republic a name to conjure by the round world over. By their virtue the American flag—beautiful as a flower to those who love it; terrible as a meteor to those who hate it—floats everywhere over peaceful seas, and is welcomed everywhere in friendly ports as the emblem of peaceful supremacy and sovereignty in the commerce of the world.

Has there been any practical statesmanship in our dealing with Cuba? You had precisely the same problem in the East and in the West. You knew all about conditions in Cuba. There has been no lack of counselors to whisper in the ear of the President and Senate and House the dishonorable counsel that we should hold on to Cuba, without regard to our pledges or our principles, and that the resolution of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] was a great mistake. "Ye shall not surely die," said the serpent—

Squat like a toad, close at the ear of Eve.

I do not know how other men may feel, but I think that the statesmen who have had something to do with bringing Cuba into the family of nations, when they look back on their career, that my friends who sit around me, when each comes to look back upon a career of honorable and brilliant public service, will count the share they had in that as among the brightest, the greenest, and the freshest laurels in their crown.

I do not think I could honestly repeat all the compliments which the Senator from Wisconsin is in the habit of paying to the Senator from Colorado. The Senator from Colorado has gone against my grain very often, especially when he voted for the Spanish treaty and when his vote defeated the Bacon resolution. But I doubt whether any man who has sat in this Chamber since

Charles Sumner died, or whether all who sit here now put together, have done a more important single service to the country than he did in securing the passage of the resolution which pledged us to deal with Cuba according to the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

You also, my imperialistic friends, have had your ideals and your sentimentalities. One is that the flag shall never be hauled down where it has once floated. Another is that you will not talk or reason with a people with arms in their hands. Another is that sovereignty over an unwilling people may be bought with gold. And another is that sovereignty may be got by force of arms, as the booty of battle or the spoils of victory.

What has been the practical statesmanship which comes from your ideals and your sentimentalities? You have wasted six hundred millions of treasure. You have sacrificed nearly 10,000 American lives—the flower of our youth. You have devastated provinces. You have slain uncounted thousands of the people you desire to benefit. You have established reconcentration camps. Your generals are coming home from their harvest, bringing their sheaves with them, in the shape of other thousands of sick and wounded and insane to drag out miserable lives, wrecked in body and mind. You make the American flag in the eyes of a numerous people the emblem of sacrilege in Christian churches, and of the burning of human dwellings, and of the horror of the water torture. Your practical statesmanship, which disdains to take George Washington and Abraham Lincoln or the soldiers of the Revolution or of the civil war as models, has looked in some cases to Spain for your example. I believe—nay, I know—that in general our officers and soldiers are humane. But in some cases they have carried on your warfare with a mixture of American ingenuity and Castilian cruelty.

Your practical statesmanship has succeeded in converting a people who three years ago were ready to kiss the hem of the garment of the American and to welcome him as a liberator, who thronged after your men when they landed on those islands with benediction and gratitude, into sullen and irreconcilable enemies, possessed of a hatred which centuries can not eradicate.

The practical statesmanship of the Declaration of Independence and the Golden Rule would have cost nothing but a few kind words. They would have bought for you the great title of liberator and benefactor, which your fathers won for your country in the South American Republics and in Japan and which you have won in Cuba. They would have bought for you the undying gratitude of a great and free people and the undying glory which belongs to the name of liberator. That people would have felt for you as Japan felt for you when she declared last summer that she owed everything to the United States of America.

What have your ideals cost you, and what have they bought for you?

1. For the Philippine Islands you have had to repeal the Declaration of Independence.

For Cuba you have had to reaffirm it and give it new luster.

2. For the Philippine Islands you have had to convert the Monroe doctrine into a doctrine of mere selfishness.

For Cuba you have acted on it and vindicated it.

3. In Cuba you have got the eternal gratitude of a free people.

In the Philippine Islands you have got the hatred and sullen submission of a subjugated people.

4. From Cuba you have brought home nothing but glory.

From the Philippines you have brought home nothing of glory.

5. In Cuba no man thinks of counting the cost. The few soldiers who came home from Cuba wounded or sick carry about their wounds and their pale faces as if they were medals of honor. What soldier glories in a wound or an empty sleeve which he got in the Philippines?

6. The conflict in the Philippines has cost you $600,000,000, thousands of American soldiers—the flower of your youth—the health and sanity of thousands more, and hundreds of thousands of Filipinos slain.

Another price we have paid as the result of your practical statesmanship. We have sold out the right, the old American right, to speak out the sympathy which is in our hearts for people who are desolate and oppressed everywhere on the face of the earth. Has there ever been a contest between power and the spirit of liberty, before that now going on in South Africa, when American Senators held their peace because they thought they were under an obligation to the nation in the wrong for not interfering with us? I have heard that it turned out that we had no great reason for gratitude of that kind. But I myself heard an American Senator, a soldier of the civil war, declare in this Chamber that, while he sympathized with the Boers, he did not say so because of our obligation to Great Britain for not meddling with us in the war with Spain. Nothing worse than that was said of us in the old slavery days. A great English poet before the civil war, in a poem entitled "The Curse," taunted us by saying that we did not dare to utter our sympathy with freedom so long as we were the holders of slaves. I remember, after fifty years, the sting and shame I felt in my youth when that was uttered. I had hoped that we had got rid of that forever before 1865.

Ye shall watch while kings conspire
Round the people's smouldering fire,
And, warm for your part,
Shall never dare, O, shame!
To utter the thought into flame
Which burns at your heart.

Ye shall watch while nations strive
With the bloodhounds—die or survive—
Drop faint from their jaws,
Or throttle them backward to death,
And only under your breath
Shall ye bless the cause.

Sometimes men are affected by particular instances who are not impressed by statistics of great numbers.

Sterne's starling in its cage has moved more hearts than were ever stirred by census tables.

Let me take two examples out of a thousand with which to contrast the natural result of the doctrine of your fathers with yours.

I do not think there ever was a more delightful occurrence in the history of Massachusetts since the Puritans or the Pilgrims landed there, than the visit to Harvard two years ago of the Cuban teachers to the Harvard Summer School. The old University put on her best apparel for the occasion. The guests were manly boys and fair girls, making you think of Tennyson's sweet girl graduates, who came to sit at the feet of old Harvard to learn something which they could teach to their pupils, and to carry back to their country and teach their own children undying gratitude to the great Republic. It was one of the most delightful lessons in all history of the gratitude of a people to its liberator, and of the affection of the liberator-Republic to the people it had delivered. Was there ever a more fitting subject for poetry or for art than the venerable President Eliot, surrounded with his staff of learned teachers and famous scholars, the foremost men in the Republic of letters and science, as he welcomed them, these young men and women, to the delights of learning and the blessings of liberty?

Contrast this scene with another. It is all you have to show, that you have brought back, so far, from the Philippine Islands. You have no grateful youth coming to sit at your feet. You do not dare to bring here even a friendly Filipino to tell you, with unfettered lips, what his people think of you, or what they want of you. I read the other day in a Nebraska paper a terrible story of the passage through Omaha of a carload of maniacs from the Philippine Islands.

The story, I believe, has been read in the Senate. I telegraphed to Omaha to the editor of a paper, of high reputation; I believe, a zealous supporter of the policy of Imperialism, to learn if the story was authentic. I am told in reply, and I am glad to know it, that the picture is sensational and exaggerated, but the substantial fact is confirmed that that load of young soldiers passed through that city lately, as other like cargoes have passed through before, maniacs and broken in mental health as the result of service in the Philippine Islands.

It is no answer to tell me that such horrors exist everywhere; that there are other maniacs at St. Elizabeth, and that every State asylum is full of them. Those unhappy beings have been visited, without any man's fault, by the mysterious Providence of God, or if their affliction comes from any man's fault it is our duty to make it known and to hold the party guilty responsible. It is a terrible picture that I have drawn. It is a picture of men suffering from the inevitable result which every reasonable man must have anticipated of the decisions made in this Chamber when we elected to make war for the principle of despotism instead of a policy of peace, in accordance with the principles of the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. President, every one of these maniacs, every one of the many like freights of horror that come back to us from the Philippine Islands, every dead soldier, every wounded or wrecked soldier was once an American boy, the delight of some American home, fairer and nobler in his young promise, as we like to think, than any other the round world over. Ah! Mr. President, it was not $20,000,000 that we paid as the price of sovereignty. It was the souls of these boys of ours that entered into the cost. When you determined by one vote to ratify the Spanish treaty; when you determined by one vote to defeat the Bacon resolution; when you declared, in the McEnery resolution, that we would dispose of that people as might be for the interest of the United States; when the Senator from Wisconsin said we would not talk to a people who had arms in their hands, although they begged that there should be no war, and that we would at least hear them; when some of you went about the country declaring that the flag never should be hauled down where it once floated, you did not know, because in your excitement and haste your intellectual vision was dazzled with empire, you did not know that this was to come. But you might have known it. A little reflection and a little reason would have told you. I wonder if the Republican editor who made that known was attacking the American Army. I wonder if those of us who do not like that are the friends or the enemies of the American soldier.

I can not understand how any man, certainly how any intelligent student of history, could have failed to foretell exactly what has happened when we agreed to the Spanish treaty. Everything that has happened since has been the natural, inevitable, inexorable result of the policy you then declared.

If you knew anything of human nature you knew that the great doctrine that just government depends on the consent of the governed, as applied to the relation of one people to another, has its foundation in the nature of man itself. No people will submit, if it can be helped, to the rule of any other people. You must have known perfectly well, if you had stopped to consider, that so far as the Philippine people were like us they would do exactly what we did and would do again in a like case. So far as they were civilized they would resist you with all the power of civilized war. So far as they were savage they would resist you by all the methods of savage warfare.

You never could eradicate from the hearts of that people by force the love of liberty which God put there.

> For He that worketh high and wise,
> Nor pauseth in His plan,
> Will take the sun out of the skies
> Ere freedom out of man.

This war, if you call it war, has gone on for three years. It will go on in some form for three hundred years, unless this policy be abandoned. You will undoubtedly have times of peace and quiet, or pretended submission. You will buy men with titles, or office, or salaries. You will intimidate cowards. You will get pretended and fawning submission. The land will smile and smile and seem at peace. But the volcano will be there. The lava will break out again. You can never settle this thing until you settle it right.

I think my friends of the majority, whatever else they may claim—and they can rightly claim a great deal that is good and creditable for themselves—will not claim to be prophets. They used to prophesy a good deal two years ago. We had great prophets and minor prophets. All predicted peace and submission, and a flag followed by trade, with wealth flowing over this land from the Far East, and the American people standing in the Philippine Islands looking over with eager gaze toward China. Where are now your prophets which prophesied unto you? I fear that we must make the answer that was made to the children of Israel: "They prophesied falsely, and the prophets have become wind, and the word is not in them."

An instance of this delusion, which seems to have prevailed everywhere, is stated by Mr. Andrew Carnegie in the May number of the North American Review. He says:

> The writer had the honor of an interview with President McKinley before war broke out with our allies, and ventured to predict that if he attempted to exercise sovereignty over the Filipinos—whom he had bought at $2.50 a head—he would be shooting these people down within thirty days. He smiled, and, addressing a gentleman who was present, said: "Mr. Carnegie doesn't understand the situation at all." Then turning to the writer, he said: "We will be welcomed as their best friends." "So little," says Mr. Carnegie, "did dear, kind, loving President McKinley expect ever to be other than the friendly cooperator with these people."

A guerrilla warfare, carried on by a weaker people against a stronger, is recognized and legitimate. Many nations have resorted to it. Our war of the Revolution in many parts of the country differed little from it. Spain carried it on against Napoleon when the French forces overran her territory, and mankind sympathized with her. The greatest of English poets since Milton, William Wordsworth, described that warfare in a noble sonnet, which will answer, with scarcely the change of a word, as a description of the Filipino people:

> Hunger, and sultry heat, and nipping blast
> From bleak hilltop, and length of march by night
> Through heavy swamp or over snow-clad height—
> These hardships ill-sustained, these dangers past,
> The roving Spanish bands are reached at last,
> Charged, and dispersed like foam; but as a flight
> Of scattered quails by signs do reunite,
> So these—and, heard of once again, are chased
> With combination of long-practiced art
> And newly kindled hope; but they are fled,
> Gone are they, viewless as the buried dead:
> Where now? Their sword is at the foeman's heart!
> And thus from year to year his walk they thwart,
> And hang like dreams around his guilty bed.

I believe the American Army, officers and soldiers, to be made up of as brave and humane men, in general, as ever lived. They have done what has always been done, and until human nature shall change, always will be done in all like conditions. The chief guilt is on the heads of those who created the conditions.

One thing, however, I am bound to say in all frankness. I do not know but my statement may be challenged. But I am sure that nearly every well-informed man who will hear it or read it will know that it is true. That is, that you will never get officers or soldiers in the standing Army, as a rule, to give testimony which they think will be disagreeable to their superiors or to the War Department.

I have letters in large numbers myself. I believe every Senator in this body, who is expected to do anything to inquire into these atrocities, has had abundant letters to the effect which I state. The same evil of which we are all conscious, which leads men in public life to be unwilling to incur unpopularity or the displeasure of their constituents by frankly uttering and acting upon their opinions, applies with a hundredfold more force when you summon a soldier or an officer to tell facts which will bear heavily on the administration of the war. I have had letters shown me by members of this body who vouched personally for the absolute trustworthiness of the writers, who detailed the horrors of the water torture and other kindred atrocities, which no inducement would lead them to make public.

The private soldier who has ended his term of service or who expects to end it and return to private life, is under less restraint. But when he tells his story he is met by the statement of an officer, in some cases, that it is well known that private soldiers are in the habit of "drawing the long bow," to use the phrase of one general whose name has been brought into this discussion. In other words, these generals are so jealous of the honor of the Army, and their own, that they confine their jealousy to the honor of the officers, and expect you to reject these things on the assertion that the soldier is an habitual liar, and then they reproach the men who complain with being indifferent to the honor of the Army.

Was it ever heard before that a civilized, humane, and Christian nation made war upon a people and refused to tell them what they wanted of them? You refuse to tell these people this year or next year or perhaps for twenty years, whether you mean in the end to deprive them of their independence, or no. You say you want them to submit. To submit to what? To mere military force? But for what purpose or what end is that military force to be exerted? You decline to tell them. Not only you decline to say what you want of them, except bare and abject surrender, but you will not even let them tell you what they ask of you.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] says it is asserted with a show of reason that a majority of the people favor our cause. General MacArthur denies this statement, and says they were almost a unit for Aguinaldo. Mr. Denby and Mr. Schurman, two of the three commissioners of the first Filipino Commission, deny the statement. General Bell, in his letter of December 13, 1901, says "a majority of the inhabitants of his province have persistently continued their opposition during the entire period of three years, and that the men who accept local office from the governor and take the oath of allegiance do it solely for the purpose of improving their opportunity for resistance." That statement is concurred in by every department commander there. Certainly Major Gardener's apparently temperate and fair statement—about which we are to have no opportunity to examine him until Congress adjourns—does not say any such thing as that suggested by the Senator from Ohio.

But what is your cause? What is your cause that they favor? Do you mean that a majority of the Filipino people favor your killing them? Certainly not. Do you mean that a majority of the Filipino people, or that any one man in the Philippine Islands, according to the evidence of Governor Taft himself, favors anything that you are willing to do?

The evidence is that some of them favor their admission as an American State and others favor a government of their own under your protection. Others would like to come in as a Territory under our Constitution. But is there any evidence that one human being there is ready to submit to your government without any rights under our Constitution, or without any prospect of coming in as an American State? Or is there any evidence that any single American citizen, in the Senate or out of it, is willing that we should do anything that a single Filipino is ready to consent to?

I have no doubt they will take the oath of allegiance. Undoubtedly they will go through the form of submission. Undoubtedly you have force enough to make the whole region a howling wilderness, if you think fit. Undoubtedly you can put up a form of government in which they will seem to take some share, and they will take your offices and your salaries. But when you come to getting anything which is not merely temporary; when you come to announce anything in principle, such as those on which governments are founded, you have not any evidence of any considerable number of people there ready to submit to your will unless they are compelled by sheer brutal force.

I do not wish to dwell at length on the circumstances which attended the capture of Aguinaldo. But as they have been elaborately defended in this body, and it is said that the officer who captured him had a good record before, and especially as he has been decorated by a promotion by the advice and consent of the Senate, I can not let it pass in silence.

I understand the facts to be that that officer disguised the men under his command in the dress of Filipino soldiers; wrote, or caused to be written, a forged letter to Aguinaldo, purporting to come from one of his officers, stating that he was about to bring him some prisoners he had captured, and in that way got access to Aguinaldo's headquarters. As he approached he sent a message to Aguinaldo that he and his friends were hungry; accepted food at his hands, and when in his presence threw down and seized him; shot some of the soldiers who were about Aguinaldo, and brought him back a prisoner into our lines. That is the transaction which is so highly applauded in imperialistic quarters.

I do not believe that the Senate knew what it was doing when it consented to General Funston's promotion. The nomination came in with a list of Army and Navy appointments and promotions—2,038 in all—and the Senate assented to that at the same time with 1,828 others. I doubt very much whether there were 10 Senators in their seats or whether one of them listened to the list as it was read. It is, I suppose, betraying no secret to say that these lists are almost never read to the Senate when they come in or when they are reported from the committee; that the only reading they get is at the time of the confirmation, when they commonly attract no attention whatever. I do not mean to say that if the Senate had had its attention called to the transaction the result would have been different. I only mean to say that I believe many Senators did not know it. I suppose the question whether the Senate would have approved it might have depended on the character and the quality of the general service of that officer and not on the estimate we formed of this particular transaction, which seems to have been done under orders. I did not know myself that the nomination had been made till long after the Senate had assented. But I incline to think, with General MacArthur's testimony before the investigating committee that the act was done by his direction and with his approval, I should not have thought it fair to hold the officer responsible for it by denying him an otherwise deserved promotion.

I think we are bound in justice to General Funston to take the declaration of General MacArthur that he ordered and approved everything that officer did. If that be true we have no right to hold the subordinate responsible, however odious the act. If it turn out that that still higher authority has approved the act, then it becomes still more emphatically our duty to point out its enormity.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], whom I do not now see in his seat, asked me day before yesterday whether I did not believe that the reports of the military officers were to be trusted. If he were in his seat, I would ask him to put me that question again, and if he should I would put this question to him: When Theodore Roosevelt, an officer of volunteers, told his story about the canned beef and the military supplies, and every officer in the Regular Army, who knew the facts just as he did, contradicted him in the investigation, does he believe that Theodore Roosevelt or the officers of the Regular Army told the truth?

Mr. President, I want to say something on the circumstances which attended the capture of Aguinaldo. They have been elaborately defended in this body, and the officer who did it has been decorated with a promotion. I do not suppose 10 Senators knew what they were doing. The name came in with several thousand names of sailors and soldiers in one day, and nearly 2,000 were confirmed the next day. As everybody knows, they are never read except at the time of the confirmation. But although I did not know anything about it myself, I am bound to say, in all fairness, that since General MacArthur, the superior officer, has testified that he approved the act and takes the responsibility for the act, the subordinate is acquitted so far as that act is concerned; and I do not see how we could have refused General Funston his promotion if his record in other respects entitled him to it, if he acted as General MacArthur says he did, under orders. But the higher the responsibility for the act the more it is our duty to examine it.

Mr. President, we have two guides for the conduct of military officers in such circumstances. They apply not only to this act of General Funston, but they apply to most of the conduct of our military officers, of which complaint has been made. One of these is Instructions for the Government of Armies of the United States in the Field, prepared by Dr. Francis Lieber and promulgated by order of Abraham Lincoln.

The other is the convention at The Hague, agreed upon by the representatives of this Government with the others on the 29th day of July, 1899, and ratified by the Senate on the 14th of March, 1902.

Observe that this convention was agreed upon before all these acts happened, and was unanimously adopted after they had all happened.

I extract from the Instructions for the Government Regulation of Armies in the Field the following paragraphs:

Paragraph 148 is this:

> The law of war does not allow proclaiming either an individual belonging to the hostile army or a citizen or a subject of the hostile government an outlaw, who may be slain without trial by any captor, any more than the modern law of peace allows such intentional outlawry. On the contrary, it abhors such outrage. The sternest retaliation should follow the murder committed in consequence of such proclamation, made by whatever authority. Civilized nations look with horror upon offers of rewards for the assassination of enemies as relapses into barbarism.

Now, Mr. President, is it denied that hundreds upon hundreds of Filipinos have been put to death without trial? Has any soldier or officer been brought to trial by our authority for these offenses? Now, if it be an outrage upon which "nations look with horror," to use the language of that paragraph, and which "the law of war * * * abhors," is it any less a crime to be abhorred when it is done without such proclamation? The proclamation does not, according to this authority, justify the officer or soldier who acts in obedience to it. On the contrary, his conduct is abhorrent to all civilized mankind. And yet these things pass without condemnation, without punishment, without trial. Gentlemen seem to be impatient when they are asked to investigate them, or even to hear the story told in the Senate of the United States.

Paragraph 16 is:

> Military necessity does not admit of cruelty—that is, the infliction of suffering for the sake of suffering or for revenge, nor of maiming or wounding except in fight, nor of torture to extort confession. It does not admit of the use of poison in any way nor of the wanton devastation of a district. It admits of deception, but disclaims acts of perfidy, and, in general, military necessity does not include any act of hostility which makes the return to peace unnecessarily difficult.

The rule says:

> It admits of deception, but disclaims acts of perfidy.

That also follows the prohibition of the use of poison, with which it is associated.

Now, perfidy is defined later in paragraph 117, which declares:

> It is justly considered an act of bad faith, of infamy, or fiendishness to deceive the enemy by flags of protection. * * *

Paragraph 65 is:

> The use of the enemy's national standard, flag, or other emblem of nationality for the purpose of deceiving the enemy in battle is an act of perfidy. * * *

Is not the uniform an emblem of nationality? If it be an act of perfidy—the use of that emblem of nationality to deceive the enemy in battle—is it any less an act of perfidy to use it to steal upon him and deceive him when he is not in battle and is in his own quarters?

This is also prohibited by the convention of The Hague, which must have been well known to all our officers, which had been signed by the representatives of this Government, although its formal approval by the Senate took place this winter.

I suppose if it be perfidy now, according to the unanimous opinion of the Senate, and was perfidy before, according to the concurrent action of 24 great nations, the question when we formally ratified the treaty becomes unimportant.

Article 23 of the convention declares:

> (f) To make improper use of a flag of truce, the national flag, or military ensigns, and the enemy's uniform—is specially prohibited. That is classed in that article also with the use of poison and poisoned arms.

So, Mr. President, the act of General Funston—not General Funston himself, if he acted under orders of his superior—but the act of General Funston is stamped with indelible infamy by Abraham Lincoln's articles of war, to which the Secretary of War appeals, and the concurrent action of 24 great nations, and the unanimous action of the Senate this winter.

Let me repeat a little: What is an act of perfidy, as distinguished from the deception which General MacArthur thinks appropriate to all war, as defined by both these great and commanding authorities?

That is defined in paragraph 65, which declares that—

> The use of the enemy's national standard, flag, or other emblem of nationality for the purpose of deceiving the enemy in battle is an act of perfidy, by which they lose all claim to the protection of the law of war.

If that be true, is it less an act of perfidy to use the uniform of the enemy—his emblem of nationality—to steal upon him when no battle is going on?

One hundred and seventeen is to like effect:

> It is justly considered an act of bad faith, of infamy, or fiendishness to deceive the enemy by a flag of protection. Such act of bad faith may be good cause for refusing to respect such flag.

Such deception is of the same kind as that practiced on the unsuspecting Aguinaldo, which the rule "justly," as it declares, "considers an act of infamy or fiendishness."

Rule 60 is:

> It is against the usage of modern war to resolve, in hatred and revenge, to give no quarter.

Observe this is not justified even by revenge.

No body of troops has the right to declare that it will not give, and therefore will not accept, quarter.

56. A prisoner of war is subject to no punishment for being a public enemy, nor is any revenge wreaked upon him by the intentional infliction of any suffering or disgrace, by cruel imprisonment, want of food, by mutilation, death, or any other barbarity.

So, Mr. President, in this attempt to force your sovereignty by this process of benevolent assimilation, we have been brought to the unexampled dishonor of disregarding our own rules for the conduct of armies in the field and to disregard the rules to which our national faith has just been pledged to substantially all the civilized powers of the earth.

I understand the facts to be that this officer, with the approval of his superior officer, disguised himself or some of his men in the Filipino uniform, stole upon Aguinaldo unawares under that guise, deceived him by a forged letter representing that they were hungry, received food at his hands, and then threw him down and made him captive.

Now, if that be not the perfidy twice denounced and expressly ranked with poisoning and other like barbarities I can not understand the meaning of human language or the force of human conduct.

But this act of General Funston's, approved by his superior officer, was in violation, not only of the laws of war, but of that law of hospitality which governs alike everywhere the civilized Christian or pagan wherever the light of chivalry has penetrated. He went to Aguinaldo under the pretense that he was ahungered, and Aguinaldo fed him. Was not that an act of perfidy? It violated the holy rite of hospitality which even the Oriental nations hold sacred?

In Scott's immortal romance of the Talisman, the Sultan Saladin interposes to prevent a criminal who had just committed a treacherous murder from partaking of his feast by striking off his head as he approached the banquet. "Had he murdered my father," said the Saladin to Richard Cœur de Lion, "and afterwards partaken of my bowl and cup, not a hair of his head could have been injured by me."

In this case it was not the host sparing the guest, it was not Conrad de Montserat partaking of the bowl and the cup of Saladin, but it was the guest who had partaken of the hospitality of the host who betrayed his benefactor, and in doing it represented the United States of America in the Philippines.

Mr. President, the story of what has been called the water torture has been, in part, told by other Senators. I have no inclination to repeat the story. I can not help believing that not a twentieth part of it has yet been told. I get letters in large numbers from officers, or the friends of officers, who repeat what they tell me, all testifying to these cruelties. And yet as in the case cited by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] the other day the officer, or the officer's friends or kindred, who send the letters to me, send them under a strict injunction of secrecy. Other Senators tell me they have a like experience. These brave officers, who would go to the cannon's mouth for honor, who never flinch in battle, flinch before what they deem the certain ruin of their prospects in life if they give the evidence which they think would be distasteful to their superiors. I do not undertake to judge of this matter. Other Senators can judge as well as I can. The American people can do it better.

I suppose, Mr. President, that those of us who are of English descent like to think that the race from which we come will compare favorably with most others in the matter of humanity. Yet history is full of the terrible cruelties committed by Englishmen when men of other races refused to submit to their authority. I think my friends who seek to extenuate this water torture, or to apologize for it, may perhaps like to look at the precedent of the dealings with the Irish rebels in 1799.

In Howell's State Trials there will be found the proceedings in a suit by Mr. Wright against James Judkin Fitzgerald, a sheriff, who ordered a citizen to be flogged for the purpose of extorting information. I believe 50 lashes were administered and then 50 more by Fitzgerald, and in many other cases the same course was taken. It was wholly to extract information, as this water torture has been to get information, Fitzgerald, the sheriff, told his own story. He pointed out the necessity of his system of terror. He said he got one man he had flogged to confess that the plaintiff was a secretary of the United Irishmen, and this information he could not get from him before; that Mr. Wright himself had offered to confess, but his memory had been so impaired by the flogging that he could not command the faculty of recollection. Notwithstanding he had by the terror of his name and the severity of his flogging succeeded most astonishingly, particularly in one instance, where, by the flogging of one man, he and 36 others acknowledged themselves United Irishmen.

Now, that was abundantly proved; and the sheriff who had tortured and flogged these men who were only fighting that Ireland should not be ruled without the consent of the governed had the effrontery to ask for an act of indemnity from the House of Commons against the damages which had been recovered against him, and that claim found plenty of advocates. The ministry undertook to extenuate the action of this monster by citing the cruelties which the Irish people had inflicted in their turn, and by saying that very material discoveries were made relative to concealed arms as the result of these tortures. The defenders of the administration said the most essential service had been rendered to the State and to the country by Mr. Fitzgerald. The attorney-general trusted the House would cheerfully accede to the prayer of the petition. Mr. Wright, the man who had been tortured, was a man of excellent character and education, and a teacher of the French language. As soon as he knew there were charges against him he went to the house of the defendant to give himself up and demand a trial. I will not take the time of the Senate to read the debates. The argument for the Government would do very well for some of the arguments we have heard here, and the arguments we have heard here would have done very well there. The House passed a general bill to indemnify all sheriffs and magistrates who had acted for the suppression of the rebellion in a way not warranted by law, and to secure them against actions at law for so doing. The sole question at stake was the right of torture to extort information. The bill passed the House, and afterwards Fitzgerald got a considerable pension, and was created a baronet of the United Kingdom.

Now, I agree that this precedent, so far as it may be held to have set an example for what has been done in the Philippine Islands, may be cited against me. I cite it only to show that such things are inevitable when you undertake by brute force to reduce to subjection an unwilling people, and that, therefore, when you enter upon that undertaking you yourselves take the responsibility for everthing that follows.

Mr. President, it is said that these horrors which never would have come to the public knowledge had not the Senate ordered this investigation, were unknown to our authorities at home. I hope and believe they were unknown to the War Department. I know they were unknown to President Roosevelt, and I know they were unknown to President McKinley. But I can not think, perhaps I am skeptical, that the recent declaration of that honorable gentleman, the Secretary of War, made on a memorable occasion, that the war on our part has been conducted with unexampled humanity, will be accepted by his countrymen.

Let us not be diverted from the true issue. We are not talking of retaliation. We are not talking of the ordinary brutalities of war. We are not talking about or inquiring into acts of vengeance committed in the heat of battle. We are talking about torture, torture—cold-blooded, deliberate, calculated torture; torture to extort information. Claverhouse did it to the Scotch Covenanters with the boot and thumb-screw. It has never since till now been done by a man who spoke English except in Ireland. The Spanish inquisition did it with the slow fire and the boiling oil. It is said that the water torture was borrowed from Spain. I am quite ready to believe it. The men who make the inquiry are told that they are assailing the honor of the American Army. How do the defenders of the American Army meet the question? By denying the fact? No. By saying that the offenders have been detected and punished by military power? Some of these facts were reported to the War Department more than a year ago. So far as I can find there have been but two men tried for torture to extort information. They were two officers who hung up men by the thumbs, and they were found guilty. The general officer who approved the finding said "that they had dishonored and degraded the American Army," and then they were sent back to their command with a reprimand. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin that the men who have stolen, and committed assaults for the gratification of brutal lusts have been punished, and punished severely.

My honorable friend from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] said something about this matter the other day. That is the only case of a punishment to be found in our records so far as I have seen them. I agree with my friend from Wisconsin that the men who have stolen and committed assaults for the gratification of brutal lusts have been punished, and punished severely, but what we are talking about is torture.

Mr. SPOONER. Did I say anything about the number?

Mr. HOAR. The Senator said there were two or three hundred cases, quoting the record before him.

Mr. CARMACK. Was it not the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER]?

Mr. HOAR. No; it was the Senator from Wisconsin, unless my memory deceives me. I will change it if I am mistaken, but I think I am not mistaken.

We are talking about torture committed in the open day by men who were not drunk, but sober; men who had not just come out of battle, but torture for the purpose of getting information, on which, according to one of this committee, the tribunals acted.

What we are talking about is the torture committed in the presence of numerous witnesses for the purpose of extorting information, and orders from high authority to depopulate whole districts, and to slay all inhabitants, including all boys over 10 years old.

Is it denied that these things have been done? Is it denied that although you are still on the threshold of this inquiry, and have only called such witnesses as you happen to find 10,000 miles away from the scene, that these things have been proved to the satisfaction of the majority of the committee, and that no man has yet been punished, although they were going on considerably more than a year ago? Now, how do our friends who seek, I will not say to defend, but to extenuate them, deal with the honor of the American Army? Why, they come into the Senate and say that there have been other cruelties and barbarities and atrocities in war. When these American soldiers and officers are called to the bar our friends summon Nero and Torquemada and the Spanish inquisition and the sheeted and ghostly leaders of the Ku Klux Klan and put them by their side. That is the way you defend the honor of the American Army. It is the first time the American soldier was put into such company by the men who have undertaken his defense.

It has been shown, I think, in the investigation now going on that the secretary of the province of Batangas declared that one-third of the 300,000 of the population of that province have died within two years—100,000 men and women.

The Boston Journal, an eminent Republican paper and a most able supporter of the imperialistic policy, printed on the 3d of May, 1901, an interview with Gen. James M. Bell, given to the New York Times—not the General Bell who has been discussed here, but Gen. James M. Bell is his name, an officer who came back from the Philippines in May, 1901.

Mr. SPOONER. James F. Bell is the one there now.

Mr. LODGE. James Franklin Bell.

Mr. HOAR. This one is James M. Bell, unless I have the initials wrong. I have taken great pains to make inquiry. I have heard from the man to whom the interview was given, a newspaper correspondent of high character, and I have applied to the gentlemen of the Boston Journal to know if they ever heard it contradicted. He said in May, 1901, and he advocated the policy in the interview, too, that one-sixth of the natives of Luzon have either been killed or have died of the dengue fever in the last two years. Now, what is the population of Luzon? It is about 3,000,000, is it not?

Mr. ALLISON. That or thereabouts.

Mr. HOAR. Then one-sixth is 500,000.

I suppose that this dengue fever and the sickness which depopulated Batangas is the direct result of the war, and comes from the condition of starvation and bad food which the war has caused. The other provinces have not been heard from. If this be true we have caused the death of more human beings in the Philippines than we have caused to our enemies, including insurgents in the terrible civil war, in all our other wars put together. The general adds that—the loss of life by killing alone has been very great, but I think not one man has been slain except where his death served the legitimate purposes of war. It has been necessary to adopt what in other countries would probably be thought harsh measures, for the Filipino is tricky and crafty and has to be fought in his own way.

I have made careful inquiry and I am satisfied that this interview is genuine. Now, all this is because you will not tell what you mean to do in the future, as I understand it.

Where did this order to make Samar a howling wilderness originate? The responsibility unquestionably, according to the discipline of armies in the field, rests with the highest authority from which it came.

We used to talk, some of us, about the horrors of Andersonville, and other things that were done during the civil war. We hope, all of us, never to hear them mentioned again. But is there anything in them worse than that which an officer of high rank in the Army, vouched for by a Senator on this floor, from personal knowledge, as a man of the highest honor and veracity, writes about the evils of these reconcentrado camps in the Philippine Islands? Now all this cost, all these young men gone to their graves, all these wrecked lives, all this national dishonor, the repeal of the Declaration of Independence, the overthrow of the principle on which the Monroe doctrine was placed by its author, the devastation of provinces, the shooting of captives, the torture of prisoners and of unarmed and peaceful citizens, the hanging men up by the thumbs, the carloads of maniac soldiers that you bring home are all because you would not tell and will not tell now whether you mean in the future to stand on the principles which you and your fathers always declared in the past.

The Senator from Ohio says it is not wise to declare what we will do at some future time. Mr. President, we do not ask you to declare what you will do at some future time. We ask you to declare an eternal principle good at the present time and good at all times. We ask you to reaffirm it, because the men most clamorous in support of what you are doing deny it. That principle, if you act upon it, prevents you from crushing out a weak nation, because of your fancied interest now or hereafter. It prevents you from undertaking to judge what institutions are fit for other nations on the poor plea that you are the strongest. We are asking you at least to go no further than to declare what you would not do now or hereafter, and the reason for declaring it is that half of you declare you will hold this people in subjection and the other half on this matter are dumb. You declared what you would not do at some future time when you all voted that you would not take Cuba against the will of her people, did you not? We ask you to declare not at what moment you will get out of the Philippine Islands, but only on what eternal principle you will act, in them or out of them. Such declarations are made in all history. They are made in every important treaty between nations.

The Constitution of the United States is itself but a declaration of what this country will do and what it will not do in all future times. The Declaration of Independence, if it have the practical meaning it has had for a hundred years, is a declaration of what this country would do through all future times. The Monroe Doctrine, to which sixteen republics south of us owe their life and their safety, was a declaration to mankind of what we would do in all future time. Among all the shallow pretenses of imperialism this statement that we will not say what we will do in the future is the most shallow of all. Was there ever such a flimsy pretext flaunted in the face of the American people as that of gentlemen who say, If any other nation on the face of the earth or all other nations together attempt to overthrow the independence of any people to the south of us in this hemisphere, we will fight and prevent them, and at the same time think it dishonorable to declare whether we will ever overthrow the independence of a weaker nation in another hemisphere.

If we take your view of it we have crushed out the only republic in Asia and put it under our heel and we are now at war with the only Christian people in the East. Even, as I said, the Senator from Ohio admits they are a people, he only says there are several peoples and not one, as if the doctrine that one people has no right to buy sovereignty over another, or to rule another against its will, did not apply in the plural number. You can not crush out an unwilling people, or buy sovereignty over them, or treat them as spoils of conquest, or booty of battle in the singular, or at retail, but you have a perfect right to do it by wholesale. Suppose there are several peoples in the Philippines. They have population enough to make a hundred and twelve States of the size of Rhode Island or Delaware when they adopted the Constitution.

I suppose, according to this modern doctrine, that if, when the Holy Alliance threatened to reduce the colonies which had thrown off the yoke of Spain in South America, not a wit more completely than the Philippine people had thrown off the yoke of Spain in Asia, if they had undertaken to subdue them all at once, John Quincy Adams and James Monroe would have held their peace and would at least have said it was not wise to say what we would do in the future. If we had the right to protect nascent republics from the tyranny of other people and to declare that we would do it in the future, and if need be would encounter the whole continent of Europe single-handed in that case, is it any less fitting to avow that we will protect such peoples from ourselves? How is it that these gentlemen who will not tell you what they will do in the future in regard to the Philippine Islands were so eager and greedy to tell you what they would do and what they would not do in the case of Cuba when we first declared war on Spain? You can make no distinction between these two cases except by having a motive, which I do not for one moment impute, that when you made war upon Spain you were afraid of Europe, if you did not make the declaration.

These people are given to us as children, to lead them out of their childhood into manhood. They were docile and affectionate in the beginning. But they needed your kindness and justice, and a respect in them for the rights we claimed for ourselves, and the rights we had declared always were inherent in all mankind. You preferred force to kindness, and power to justice, and war to peace, and pride to generosity.

You said you would not treat with a man with arms in his hands. You have come, instead, to torture him when he was unarmed and defenseless. Yet you said you would make his conduct the measure of your own; that if he lied to you, you would lie to him; that if he were cruel to you, you would be cruel to him; that if he were a savage, you would be a savage also. You held an attitude toward him which you hold to no strong or to no civilized power. You decorate an officer for the capture of Aguinaldo by treachery, and the next week ratify The Hague convention and denounce such action, and classify it with poisoning and breaking of faith.

You tell us, Mr. President, that the Philippine people have practiced some cruelties themselves. The investigation has not yet gone far enough to enable you to tell which side begun these atrocities. One case which one of the members of the majority of the committee told the Senate the other day was well established by proving that it occurred long before April, 1901, and was so published, far and wide, in the press of this country at that time. I do not learn that there was any attempt to investigate it, either by the War Department or by Congress, until the beginning of the present session of Congress. But suppose they did begin it. Such things are quite likely to occur when weakness is fighting for its rights against strength. Is their conduct any excuse for ours? The Philippine people is but a baby in the hands of our Republic. The young athlete, the giant, the Hercules, the Titan, forces a fight upon a boy 10 years old and then blames the little fellow because he hits below the belt.

I see that my enthusiastic friend from North Carolina seeks to break the force of these revelations by saying that they are only what some Americans are wont to do at home. It is benevolent assimilation over again. It is just what the junior Senator from Indiana predicted. He thought we should conduct affairs in the Philippine Islands so admirably that we should pattern our domestic administration on that model. But did I understand that the Senator from North Carolina proposes, if his charge against the Democrats there is true, to make North Carolina a howling wilderness, or to burn populous towns of 10,000 people, to get the people of North Carolina into reconcentration camps, and to slay every male child over 10 years old? I know nothing about the truth of the Senator's charges. They have never been investigated by the Senate so far. We had some painful investigations years ago by committees in this body and of the other House, notably one of which the senior Senator from Colorado was chairman. But I never heard that you undertook to apply to Americans the methods which, if not justified, at least are sought to be extenuated, in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. President, if the stories which come to me in private from officers of the Army and from the kindred and friends of soldiers are to be trusted; if the evidence which seems to be just beginning before the Senate Committee can be trusted, there is nothing in the conduct of Spain in Cuba worse than the conduct of Americans in the Philippine Islands. If this evidence be true, and nobody is as yet ready to deny it, and Spain were strong enough, she would have the right to-morrow to wrest the Philippine Islands from our grasp on grounds as good, if not better, than those which justified us when we made war upon her. The United States is a strong and powerful country—the strongest and most powerful on earth, as we love to think. But it is the first time in the history of this people for nearly three hundred years when we had to appeal to strength and not to the righteousness of our cause to maintain our position in a great debate of justice and liberty.

Gentlemen tell us that the Filipinos are savages, that they have inflicted torture, that they have dishonored our dead and outraged the living. That very likely may be true. Spain said the same thing of the Cubans. We have made the same charges against our own countrymen in the disturbed days after the war. The reports of committees and the evidence in the documents in our library are full of them. But who ever heard before of an American gentleman, or an American, who took as a rule for his own conduct the conduct of his antagonist, or who claimed that the Republic should act as savages because she had savages to deal with? I had supposed, Mr. President, that the question, whether a gentleman shall lie or murder or torture, depended on his sense of his own character, and not on his opinion of his victim. Of all the miserable sophistical shifts which have attended this wretched business from the beginning, there is none more miserable than this.

You knew—men are held to know what they ought to know in morals and in the conduct of States—and you knew that this people would resist you; you knew you were to have a war; you knew that if they were civilized, so far as they were civilized and like you, the war would be conducted after the fashion of civilized warfare, and that so far as they were savage the war would be conducted on their part after the fashion of savage warfare; and you knew also that if they resisted and held out, their soldiers would be tempted to do what they have done, and would yield to that temptation.

And I tell you, Mr. President, that if you do not disregard the lessons of human nature thus far, and do not retrace your steps and set an example of another conduct, you will have and those who follow you will have a like experience hereafter. You may pacify this country on the surface; you may make it a solitude, and call it peace; you may burn towns; you may exterminate populations; you may kill the children or the boys over 10, as Herod slew the firstborn of the Israelites. But the volcano will be there. You will not settle this thing in a generation or in a century or in ten centuries, until it is settled right. It never will be settled right until you look for your counselors to George Washington and Thomas Jefferson and John Quincy Adams and Abraham Lincoln, and not to the reports of the War Department.

There is much more I should like to say, but I have spoken too long already. I have listened to what many gentlemen have said—gentlemen whom I love and honor—with profound sorrow. They do over again in the Senate what Burke complained of to the House of Commons.

> In order to prove that the Americans have no right to their liberties we are every day endeavoring to subvert the maxims which preserve the whole spirit of our own. To prove that the Americans ought not to be free we are obliged to depreciate the value of freedom itself; and we never seem to gain a paltry advantage over them in debate without attacking some of those principles or deriding some of those feelings for which our ancestors have shed their blood.

I wish to cite another weighty maxim from Burke:

> America, gentlemen say, is a noble object—it is an object well worth fighting for. Certainly it is, if fighting a people be the best way of gaining them. Gentlemen in this respect will be led to their choice of means by their complexions and their habits. Those who understand the military art will of course have some predilection for it. Those who wield the thunder of the state may have more confidence in the efficacy of arms. But I confess, possibly for the want of this knowledge, my opinion is much more in favor of prudent management than of force—considering force not as an odious, but a feeble instrument, for preserving a people so numerous, so active, so growing, so spirited as this, in a profitable connection with us.
> There is nothing—

Says Gibbon, the historian of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire—

> more adverse to nature and reason than to hold in obedience remote countries and foreign nations in opposition to their inclination and interest. A torrent of barbarians may pass over the earth, but an extensive empire must be supported by a refined system of policy and oppression; in the center, an absolute power, prompt in action and rich in resources; a swift and easy communication with the extreme parts; fortifications to check the first effort of rebellion; a regular administration to protect and punish; and a well-disciplined army to inspire fear, without provoking discontent and despair.

Lord Elgin, Governor-General of India and formerly Governor-General of Canada, well known and highly esteemed in the United States, declared as the result of his experience in the East: "It is a terrible business, however—this living among inferior races. I have seldom from man or woman since I came to the East heard a sentence which was reconcilable with the hypothesis that Christianity had ever come into the world. Detestation, contempt, ferocity, vengeance, whether Chinamen or Indians be the object. One moves among them with perfect indifference, treating them not as dogs, because in that case one would whistle to them and pat them, but as machines with which one can have no communion or sympathy. When the passions of fear and hatred are ingrafted on this indifference, the result is frightful—an absolute callousness as to the sufferings of the objects of those passions, which must be witnessed to be understood and believed."

The glowing narrative of Macaulay, the eloquence of Burke and Sheridan have made the crimes committed in India under the rule of Warren Hastings familiar to mankind. Yet I believe the verdict of history has acquitted Hastings, as the tribunal that tried him acquitted him. He was dismissed, exculpated, from the bar of the House of Lords, and decorated. He was sworn of the Privy Council and received at court. A large purse was made up for him by the East India Company. Yet no man doubts the truth of Burke's terrible indictment. He was acquitted because England, and not he, was the criminal. When England undertook to assert her rule in India what followered was the inevitable consequence of the decision.

Lord Erskine, the foremost advocate who ever spoke the English tongue on English soil, placed with unerring sagacity the defense of Hastings on this ground alone. He admitted that Hastings, in ruling India, "may, and must, have offended against the laws of God and nature." "If he was the faithful viceroy of an empire wrested in blood from the people to whom God and nature had given it, he may and must have preserved that unjust dominion over timorous and abject nations by a terrifying superiority." "A government having no root in consent or affection, no foundation in similarity of interests, nor support from any one principle which cements men in society together could only be upheld by alternate stratagem and force." Erskine adds: "To be governed at all, they must be governed with a rod of iron; and our empire in the East would long since have been lost to Great Britain if civil skill and military prowess had not united their efforts to support an authority which Heaven never gave—by means which it never can sanction."

Mr. President, this is the eternal law of human nature. You may struggle against it, you may try to escape it, you may persuade yourself that your intentions are benevolent, that your yoke will be easy and your burden will be light, but it will assert itself again and again. Government without the consent of the governed—an authority which Heaven never gave—can only be supported by means which Heaven never can sanction.

The American people have got this one question to answer.

They may answer it now; they can take ten years, or twenty years, or a generation, or a century to think of it. But it will not down. They must answer it in the end—Can you lawfully buy with money, or get by brute force of arms, the right to hold in subjugation an unwilling people, and to impose on them such constitution as you, and not they, think best for them?

We have answered this question a good many times in the past. The fathers answered it in 1776, and founded the Republic upon their answer, which has been the corner stone. John Quincy Adams and James Monroe answered it again in the Monroe doctrine, which John Quincy Adams declared was only the doctrine of the consent of the governed. The Republican party answered it when it took possession of the forces of Government at the beginning of the most brilliant period in all legislative history. Abraham Lincoln answered it when, on that fatal journey to Washington in 1861, he announced that the doctrine of the consent of the governed was the cardinal doctrine of his political creed, and declared, with prophetic vision, that he was ready to be assassinated for it if need be. You answered it again yourselves when you said that Cuba, who had no more title than the people of the Philippine Islands had to their independence, of right ought to be free and independent.

The question will be answered again hereafter. It will be answered soberly and deliberately and quietly as the American people are wont to answer great questions of duty. It will be answered, not in any turbulent assembly, amid shouting and clapping of hands and stamping of feet, where men do their thinking with their heels and not with their brains. It will be answered in the churches and in the schools and in the colleges; and it will be answered in fifteen million American homes, and it will be answered as it has always been answered. It will be answered right.

A famous orator once imagined the nations of the world uniting to erect a column to Jurisprudence in some stately capital. Each country was to bring the name of its great jurist to be inscribed on the side of the column, with a sentence stating what he and his country through him had done toward establishing the reign of law in justice for the benefit of mankind.

Rome said, "Here is Numa, who received the science of law from the nymph Egeria in the cavern and taught its message to his countrymen. Here is Justinian, who first reduced law to a code, made its precepts plain, so that all mankind could read it, and laid down the rules which should govern the dealing of man with man in every transaction of life."

France said, "Here is D'Aguesseau, the great chancellor, to whose judgment seat pilgrims from afar were wont to repair to do him reverence."

England said, "Here is Erskine, who made it safe for men to print the truth, no matter what tyrant might dislike to read it."

Virginia said, "Here is Marshall, who breathed the vital principle into the Constitution, infused into it, instead of the letter that killeth, the spirit that maketh alive, and enabled it to keep State and nation each in its appointed bounds, as the stars abide in their courses."

I have sometimes fancied that we might erect here in the capital of the country a column to American Liberty which alone might rival in height the beautiful and simple shaft which we have erected to the fame of the Father of the Country. I can fancy each generation bringing its inscription, which should recite its own contribution to the great structure of which the column should be but the symbol.

The generation of the Puritan and the Pilgrim and the Huguenot claims the place of honor at the base. "I brought the torch of Freedom across the sea. I cleared the forest. I subdued the savage and the wild beast. I laid in Christian liberty and law the foundations of empire."

The next generation says: "What my fathers founded I builded. I left the seashore to penetrate the wilderness. I planted schools and colleges and courts and churches."

Then comes the generation of the great colonial day. "I stood by the side of England on many a hard-fought field. I helped humble the power of France. I saw the lilies go down before the lion at Louisburg and Quebec. I carried the cross of St. George in triumph in Martinique and the Havana. I knew the stormy pathways of the ocean. I followed the whale from the Arctic to the Antarctic seas, among tumbling mountains of ice and under equinoctial heat, as the great English orator said, 'No sea not vexed by my fisheries; no climate not witness to my toils.'"

Then comes the generation of the Revolutionary time. "I encountered the power of England. I declared and won the Independence of my country. I placed that declaration on the eternal principles of justice and righteousness which all mankind have read, and on which all mankind will one day stand. I affirmed the dignity of human nature and the right of the people to govern themselves. I devised the securities against popular haste and delusion which made that right secure. I created the Supreme Court and the Senate. For the first time in history I made the right of the people to govern themselves safe, and established institutions for that end which will endure forever."

The next generation says, "I encountered England again. I vindicated the right of an American ship to sail the seas the wide world over without molestation. I made the American sailor as safe at the ends of the earth as my fathers had made the American farmer safe in his home. I proclaimed the Monroe doctrine in the face of the Holy Alliance, under which 16 Republics have joined the family of nations. I filled the Western Hemisphere with Republics from the Lakes to Cape Horn, each controlling its own destiny in safety and in honor."

Then comes the next generation: "I did the mighty deeds which in your younger years you saw and which your fathers told. I saved the Union. I put down the rebellion. I freed the slave. I made of every slave a freeman, and of every freeman a citizen, and of every citizen a voter."

Then comes another who did the great work in peace, in which so many of you had an honorable share: "I kept the faith. I paid the debt. I brought in conciliation and peace instead of war. I secured in the practice of nations the great Doctrine of Expatriation. I devised the Homestead system. I covered the prairie and the plain with happy homes and with mighty States. I crossed the continent and joined together the seas with my great railroads. I declared the manufacturing independence of America, as my fathers affirmed its political independence. I built up our vast domestic commerce. I made my country the richest, freest, strongest, happiest people on the face of the earth."

And now what have we to say? What have we to say? Are we to have a place in that honorable company? Must we engrave on that column, "We repealed the Declaration of Independence. We changed the Monroe doctrine from a doctrine of eternal righteousness and justice, resting on the consent of the governed, to a doctrine of brutal selfishness, looking only to our own advantage. We crushed the only republic in Asia. We made war on the only Christian people in the East. We converted a war of glory to a war of shame. We vulgarized the American flag. We introduced perfidy into the practice of war. We inflicted torture on unarmed men to extort confession. We put children to death. We established reconcentrado camps. We devasted provinces. We baffled the aspirations of a people for liberty."

No, Mr. President. Never! Never! Other and better counsels will yet prevail. The hours are long in the life of a great people. The irrevocable step is not yet taken.

Let us at least have this to say: We too have kept the faith of the Fathers. We took Cuba by the hand. We delivered her from her age-long bondage. We welcomed her to the family of nations. We set mankind an example never beheld before of moderation in victory. We led hesitating and halting Europe to the deliverance of their beleaguered ambassadors in China. We marched through a hostile country—a country cruel and barbarous—without anger or revenge. We returned benefit for injury, and pity for cruelty. We made the name of America beloved in the East as in the West. We kept faith with the Philippine people. We kept faith with our own history. We kept our national honor unsullied. The flag which we received without a rent we handed down without a stain. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to remind Senators that the manifestations of applause are in violation of the rules of the Senate, and that those rules can not be enforced in the galleries if they are neglected on the floor of the Senate.

Mr. BACON. I think it should be noted that the main applause was on the floor of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is what the Chair was calling attention to—a violation of the rules of the Senate on the floor.

Mr. FORAKER. And on the Democratic side.

Mr. BACON. I beg pardon of the Chair. I did not know that the Chair had noticed the fact which he has just stated. I thought the Chair was reproving the occupants of the galleries, and I wished the Senate to take the responsibility.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair took occasion to remark that the rules could not be enforced in the galleries unless they were observed by Senators.

Mr. BACON. That is all right.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1172) granting an increase of pension to Catharine F. Edmunds.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the following bills and joint resolution:

A bill (H. R. 6330) granting an increase of pension to William D. Tanner;

A bill (H. R. 12418) granting a pension to Matilda E. Clarke; and

A joint resolution (H. J. Res. 113) authorizing the use and improvement of Governors Island, Boston Harbor.

The message further announced that the House had passed with amendments the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (S. 2296) to amend an act approved March 2, 1895, relating to public printing;

A bill (S. 2782) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River by the Washington and Oregon Railway Company;

A bill (S. 3908) granting homesteaders on the abandoned Fort Bridger, Fort Sanders, and Fort Laramie military reservations, in Wyoming, the right to purchase one-quarter section of public land on said reservations as pasture or grazing lands; and

A bill (S. 4264) providing that the statute of limitations of the several States shall apply as a defense to actions brought in any courts for the recovery of lands patented under the treaty of May 10, 1854, between the United States of America and the Shawnee tribe of Indians.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. 10299) authorizing the Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Company to sell or lease its railroad property and franchises, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 11657) allowing the construction of a dam across the St. Lawrence River;

A bill (H. R. 14109) to authorize the Macon Ice, Light, and Power Company to construct certain improvements on the Noxubee River, in the State of Mississippi;

A bill (H. R. 14189) to permit the occupancy of the public-printing building by the Grand Army of the Republic; and

A bill (H. R. 14411) to regulate commutation for good conduct for United States prisoners.

The message further requested the Senate to reconsider the vote whereby it passed the bill (H. R. 12576) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Wells.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 5406) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Savannah River from the mainland of Aiken County, S. C., to the mainland of Richmond County, Ga.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the resolution of the Senate to correct an error in the enrollment of the bill (S. 593) for the establishment, control, operation, and maintenance of a National Sanitarium of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Hot Springs, in the State of South Dakota.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution:

A bill (S. 173) for the relief of the owners of the British ship Foscola and cargo;

A bill (S. 3129) for the authorization of the erection of buildings by the international committee of Young Men's Christian Associations on military reservations of the United States;

A bill (S. 3666) to authorize the sale of a part of the Fort Niobrara Military Reservation, in the State of Nebraska;

A bill (S. 3848) granting a deed of quitclaim and release to Lorillard Spencer, his heirs and assigns, of all the right, title, and interest in and to certain land in the city of Newport, R. I.;

A bill (H. R. 8466) granting a pension to Lucinda A. Sirwell;

A bill (H. R. 8587) for the allowance of certain claims for stores and supplies reported by the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act approved March 3, 1883, and commonly known as the Bowman Act, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. 8921) granting increase of pension to Jesse C. Rhodabeck;

A bill (H. R. 9226) granting a pension to Elizabeth I. Ogden;

A bill (H. R. 9249) granting a pension to Amos Allport;

A bill (H. R. 9437) granting increase of pension to Elias A. Calkins;

A bill (H. R. 9569) granting increase of pension to Albert Deits;

A bill (H. R. 9926) granting increase of pension to James F. Patton;

A bill (H. R. 9928) granting a pension to Benjamin E. Styles;

A bill (H. R. 10165) granting increase of pension to Delia E. Slocum;

A bill (H. R. 10201) granting increase of pension to Otis R. Freeman;

A bill (H. R. 10731) granting increase of pension to Samuel P. Milburn;

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. DUBOIS. I desire to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if there is anyone on his side of the Chamber who desires to speak?

Mr. LODGE. No; there is nobody on this side. The Senator knows that the Senators on this side who were to speak have spoken, except the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is no amendment pending. If there are no amendments to be offered as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. The understanding certainly was—although there was not an understanding about the time—that the debate should proceed continuously. The understanding was with the Senator from Idaho and was made in open Senate. I supposed, of course, some one on the other side would be ready to go on to-day.

Mr. DUBOIS. There are Senators on our side who desire to go on, and they will do so. I myself intended to speak day before yesterday and yesterday, but I am not ready to go on this afternoon. The Senator from Colorado is ready.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I do not think anybody ought to be required to go on for at least some little time. There are a number of Senators who desire to be absent from the Chamber for twenty or thirty minutes; and I move that the Senate take a recess for thirty minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado moves that the Senate take a recess for thirty minutes.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to that, unless the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] would like to dispose of his conference report.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from Vermont will not call up the report at the present time.

Mr. LODGE. I shall be glad, unless the Senator from Vermont desires to go on with his conference report, to have the Senate take a recess, as suggested.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator from Vermont desires to call up the report, I hope he will. I did not know that he wished to do so.

Mr. PROCTOR. I have no desire to hasten it. I think it is well that it lie over for a day, certainly.

Mr. TELLER. If the proposition as to a recess is objectionable to the Senator from Massachusetts, I will withdraw it.

Mr. LODGE. It is not in the least. The motion the Senator proposes will be extremely convenient to me personally.

Mr. TELLER. And to some others.

Mr. LODGE. And to a number of other Senators, as I am well aware.

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I should be very glad, so far as I am concerned, to have the Senate take the recess proposed by the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Colorado, that the Senate take a recess for thirty minutes.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 2 o'clock and 52 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess for thirty minutes, at the expiration of which time it reassembled.

THOMAS WELLS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair takes this opportunity to lay before the Senate a message from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 22, 1902.

Whereas the House has been informed that since the passage of the bill (H. R. 12576) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Wells the said Thomas Wells has died: Therefore,

Resolved, That the bill H. R. 12576 be transmitted to the Senate with the request that it reconsider the vote whereby it passed the said bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, as I understand the matter, the bill has not been signed by the presiding officer of either branch of Congress.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It has not.

Mr. GALLINGER. Under those circumstances it strikes me that the message is rather an extraordinary one. The other body could have finally disposed of the measure. I move that the matter lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR. Let the message be read again.

The Secretary again read the message from the House of Representatives.

Mr. HOAR. What is the position of the bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it is a House bill passed by the House; that it came to the Senate, and that the Senate concurred in its passage and returned it to the House with a statement of that action. The House enrolled the bill, but the enrolled bill was not signed by the Speaker, and now a resolution is passed by the House sending the bill back to the Senate and asking the Senate to reconsider the vote by which it was passed. The Senator from New Hampshire moves that the message lie on the table.

Mr. HOAR. What becomes of the bill?

Mr. GALLINGER. It will lie there also.

Mr. HOAR. How does the message put the bill upon the table?

Mr. GALLINGER. The bill, if the Senator will permit me, is in the possession of the House of Representatives, if it has not been signed by the Speaker; and it strikes me the House can make a final disposition of it without instructing the Senate how to proceed to dispose of a House bill.

Mr. HOAR. I think the Senator is entirely right. The message then simply lies on the table and the House deals with the bill as it sees fit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire.

The motion was agreed to.

COLUMBIA RIVER BRIDGE.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2782) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Columbia River by the Washington and Oregon Railway Company, which was, on page 2, line 19, to strike out "ten" and insert "six."

Mr. MITCHELL. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Commerce:

A bill (H. R. 11657) allowing the construction of a dam across the St. Lawrence River; and

A bill (H. R. 14109) to authorize the Macon Ice, Light, and Power Company to construct certain improvements on the Noxubee River in the State of Mississippi.

The bill (H. R. 10299) authorizing the Santa Fe Pacific Railroad Company to sell or lease its railroad property and franchises, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pacific Railroads.

The bill (H. R. 14189) to permit the occupancy of the public-printing building by the Grand Army of the Republic was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The bill (H. R. 14411) to regulate commutation for good conduct for United States prisoners was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

LIEUTENANT ARNOLD AND SERGEANT EDWARDS.

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has kindly yielded to me to offer a resolution for information on a matter relative to the Philippine question, for which I ask present consideration at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas asks unanimous consent to offer a resolution. It will be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate all official papers in his possession which relate to charges against Lieutenant Arnold and Sergeant Edwards by Private Andrew K. Weir, including the report of Capt. P. W. West, United States Army, of date August 21, 1901.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. FORAKER. I was about to make an inquiry. As the resolution was read I would suppose that it calls for the original papers. I do not suppose that the Senator wants to have the original papers sent from the War Department to the Senate. I rose to make that inquiry.

Mr. CULBERSON. The original papers, of course, are not desired, and the Secretary of War I think will properly construe the resolution to mean copies. I have no objection to inserting the word "copies."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Senate" insert "copies of;" so as to read:

Send to the Senate copies of all official papers.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that the resolution be read.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Let it be read again.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read as modified.

The Secretary read the resolution as modified, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate copies of all official papers in his possession which relate to charges against Lieutenant Arnold and Sergeant Edwards by Private Andrew K. Weir, including the report of Capt. P. W. West, United States Army, of date August 21, 1901.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to inquire if these charges resulted in a court-martial?

Mr. CULBERSON. I will state that my information is that certain charges were made by Andrew K. Weir against this officer and that a report thereon was made by Captain West. I am not advised as to whether a court-martial resulted or, if so, the result of the court-martial. The object of the resolution is to elicit those facts.

Mr. SPOONER. When was the resolution introduced?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was just introduced.

Mr. SPOONER. I object to its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin objects to the present consideration of the resolution.

ASSAY OFFICE AT PORTLAND, OREG.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from Colorado yield to me for a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask for the consideration of the bill (S. 641) to establish an assay office at Portland, Oreg.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. TELLER. If there is to be no debate, I shall not object.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments, in line 11, after the word "thousand" to strike out "five hundred," and insert "two hundred and fifty;" in line 13, after the word "thousand" to strike out "five" and insert "four;" and in line 5, page 2, before the word "thousand" to strike out "twenty" and insert "fifteen;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized and required to establish an assay office of the United States at Portland, in the State of Oregon; said assay office to be conducted under the provisions of the act entitled "An act revising and amending the laws relating to the mints and assay offices and the coinage of the United States," approved February 12, 1873; that the officers of the assay office shall be an assayer in charge, at a salary of $2,250 per annum, who shall also perform the duties of melter; chief clerk, at a salary of $1,400 per annum. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to rent a suitable building for the use of said assay office; and there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $15,000 for salary of assayer in charge, chief clerk, and wages of workmen, rent, and contingent expenses.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, as no one seems disposed to debate the merits or the demerits of the pending measure to-day, I wish to submit a few facts to the Senate, because it seems to me to be a proper time to do it, with reference to the proceedings of Congress when we entered upon the war with Spain. I do not intend to go into a thorough, detailed statement of what occurred, but at least several Senators in the course of the debate on the pending measure have referred to the declaration made in the bill we passed with reference to intervention and to the fourth resolution. The junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] the other day referred to it as having been an embarrassing question for the Government during this whole treatment of the subject. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], who addressed us a day or two ago, referred to it also as an embarrassing question.

Mr. President, not being closely connected with the Administration, as those Senators are, I am not able to say that it was not an embarrassing feature, but I can not see how it was embarrassing, and I do not believe that it in any wise embarrassed the administration of public affairs.

The question what we should do with reference to the war in Cuba was before the Senate at least something like two years before we took any action. It was also before the House. It would be interesting to take the various resolutions, both in the House and in the Senate, commencing in 1896 and continuing up to 1898, when we made our final movement. I can not say how many resolutions were introduced, but I should say not less than forty or fifty all told. I have, I believe, gone over every one of them.

Mr. SPOONER. On Cuba?

Mr. TELLER. On Cuba, with reference to the war going on in Cuba, and with reference to our duties and our obligations. I believe I can say that every one that proposed anything to be done affirmatively by the Government of the United States went upon the theory that we were to encourage and aid the establishment of a free and independent government. I think I may say, without fear of contradiction, that every Senator who took the floor on that subject, either by resolution which he introduced, or by speeches which he made, committed himself to the doctrine that whatever we should do to get rid of Spain must eventuate in the independence of the island of Cuba.

In many cases it was declared that the purpose was to secure the establishment of the Republic of Cuba; in some cases it was simply an independent government, and in other cases the government then in existence was recognized and referred to—for instance, we said, "war having existed between Spain and the government which had been created and maintained in Cuba for some time," which meant, of course, the insurrectionary government there. When we came to finally act, there was a very strong and decided movement in this body in favor of recognizing the Republic of Cuba as it then existed; and I should like to say, Mr. President, that whilst I feel we are very happily out of the difficulties by which we were surrounded in Cuba, I believe now it would have been better if we had in the beginning recognized the independence of Cuba, as we have now recognized it. We have done that through the military power, and we have recognized the independence of the people of that island through the House of Representatives and through the Senate by the resolutions passed yesterday and the day before.

The President of the United States in an address made at a gathering in New York a day or two ago—on the 20th instant, I think—congratulated the people and congratulated the Government on the fact that we had carried out the promise we made in the spring of 1898, and that the people of Cuba had established, with our aid, a government.

Mr. President, I think that is a matter of congratulation. I do not know of anything which has occurred in my public life which has given me more pleasure than the result of our interference in Cuba, and the fulfillment of the pledge we made to those people. Before I proceed further, I want to say that nobody thought of anything else but independence for the island of Cuba.

I want now to say a word about the probable result, in my opinion, of the movement established and consummated on the 20th instant. I know it is said that the Latin race is a turbulent race, and that in Cuba they have some elements which are calculated perhaps to create friction between the races. That there may be danger of some kind of turbulence, I admit, but I feel morally certain that the Republic of Cubic has come to stay, to exist.

If, as has been sometimes suggested, Cuba is ever to be a part of the United States, the Supreme Court of the United States having declared that it is not now, it will be only when the people of that island indicate and express their desire to be admitted into the Union; but that is a question, in my judgment, so far in the future that it is not worth while now to consider it. I believe they will maintain peace and order, though that there may be occasional commotions there I have no doubt.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the action of Congress in 1896 with reference to this question. On the 28th of February, 1896—that was a little more that two years before our final action—the Senate passed this resolution:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, in the opinion of Congress, a condition of public war exists between the Government of Spain and the government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba; and that the United States of America should maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States.

That resolution came from the Committee on Foreign Relations; and that is a declaration, if it is possible to make a declaration, that there was a government in Cuba at that time.

On the floor of the Senate this amendment was made:

Resolved further, That the friendly offices of the United States should be offered by the President to the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

When the vote was taken on the adoption of that resolution, the yeas were 64 and the nays were 6. So it will be seen that the vote was practically unanimous.

It would be very interesting, Mr. President, if it were now but 12 or 1 o'clock in the day, to go over some of the speeches made by prominent members of this body. I think that no action of the Senate I can recall was conducted with more unanimity and with a more general agreement on all sides than this. I recall that the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] made two speeches at some length on this subject, in which he took very decided ground in favor of a free government for Cuba, and I believe in every utterance he made he did the same. The senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] also took very decided ground; and the then Senator from Nebraska, Mr. Thurston, was very active in the same direction. I think I might name almost all the members of the Senate who voted for this resolution in some shape or other and expressed their approval of it before the vote was taken.

That resolution went to the House of Representatives on the same day. The entire action can be found in the RECORD. When the resolution was read to the House of Representatives the RECORD shows that there was "loud applause." Later the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations in the House of Representatives reported a substitute for the Senate resolution. This was on the 2d day of March, 1896. The substitute resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of Congress, a state of public war exists in Cuba, the parties to which are entitled to belligerent rights, and the United States should observe a strict neutrality between the belligerents.

Resolved, That Congress deplores the destruction of life and property caused by the war now waging in that island, and believing that the only permanent solution of the contest equally in the interest of Spain, the people of Cuba, and other nations would be in the establishment of a government by the choice of the people of Cuba, it is the sense of Congress that the Government of the United States should use its good offices and friendly influence to that end.

Resolved, That the United States has not intervened in struggles between any European Governments and their colonies on this continent; but from the very close relations between the people of the United States and those of Cuba in consequence of its proximity and the extent of the commerce between the two peoples the present war is entailing such losses upon the people of the United States that Congress is of opinion that the Government of the United States should be prepared to protect the legitimate interests of our citizens, by intervention if necessary.

Mr. President, the wording of that is different from the Senate resolution. Both of them recognized that there was to be an independent government of Cuba. In other words, we did not take the position that Spain should have any control over it, or should establish a better government, or anything of that kind. All our action looked to the ultimate and entire release of Cuba from Spanish domination; and nowhere at no time was there a suggestion which I can find in any of the speeches made—and I have gone over them with some care—by anyone, either in the House of Representatives or in the Senate of the United States, that we wanted any other relation than that which exists between us now, when Cuba is an independent Republic.

The House of Representatives on the same day voted on the proposition which I have just read, and the yeas were 262 and the nays 17. There was some disagreement between the two Houses. Finally a conference committee was appointed and an agreement was arrived at.

The resolution as it became a law, which it did on the 6th day of April, 1896, will be found in the twenty-ninth volume of the Statutes at Large, on page 10 of the appendix. It passed the Senate February 28, 1896, and passed the House of Representatives April 6, 1896. As it finally became a law it reads:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring therein), That, in the opinion of Congress, a condition of public war exists between the Government of Spain and the government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba—

I call especial attention to the fact that everywhere we recognized the existence of a government of some kind in Cuba—and that the United States of America should maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States.

Resolved further, That the friendly offices of the United States should be offered by the President to the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator kindly give me the reference to that?

Mr. TELLER. It will be found in volume 29 of the Statutes at Large, on page 10 of the appendix. I will send it to the Senator.

Mr. President, that was our first act. That the public were interested in this question, and that the public sentiment was in accord with the sentiment of Congress, I can show, I think, by reference to the platform of the Republican party in 1896. I will say, while I did not agree with all the provisions of that platform, this is one in which I heartily concurred, and it was unanimously passed by the committee on the platform, and unanimously adopted by the convention. That plank in the Republican platform reads:

CUBA.

From the hour of achieving their own independence the people of the United States have regarded with sympathy the struggles of other American peoples to free themselves from European domination. We watch with deep and abiding interest the heroic battle of the Cuban patriots against cruelty and oppression, and our best hopes go out for the full success of their determined contest for liberty. The Government of Spain, having lost control of Cuba, and being unable to protect the property or lives of resident American citizens, or to comply with its treaty obligations, we believe that the Government of the United States should actively use its influence and good offices to restore peace and give independence to the island.

The Democrats said in their platform:

CUBA.

We extend our sympathy to the people of Cuba in their heroic struggle for liberty and independence.

The Populists said:

We tender to the patriotic people of Cuba our deepest sympathy in their heroic struggle for political freedom and independence, and we believe the time has come when the United States, the great Republic of the world, should recognize that Cuba is and of right ought to be a free and independent State.

If there were any other political conventions that failed to indorse the independence of Cuba they have escaped my attention. I do not believe there was any sentiment anywhere against the expressions in these three platforms.

On the 29th of January, 1896, the Committee on Foreign Relations presented a resolution, out of which grew ultimately the one which I have read. There was a minority report made by several members of the committee, who agreed with everything that the majority did, except that they wanted to go further and recognize the Republic of Cuba.

On the 24th day of February, on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], the resolution presented by him on the 5th of February, which was for the recognition of Cuban independence, was, without objection, substituted for the resolution presented on the 29th of January. If any Senator has the curiosity to examine it, he will find that on page 2054 of the RECORD of that session. Senator White, of California, offered as a substitute another resolution, which was as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate contemplates with solicitude and profound regret the suffering and destruction accompanying the civil conflict now in progress in Cuba. While the United States have not interfered and will not, unless their vital interests so demand, interfere with existing colonies and dependencies of any European government on this hemisphere, nevertheless our people have never disguised and do not now conceal their sympathy for all those who struggle patriotically, as do the Cubans now in revolt, to exercise, maintain, and preserve the right of self-government. Nor can we ignore our exceptional and close relations to Cuba by reason of geographical proximity and our consequent grave interest in all questions affecting the control or well-being of that island. We trust that the executive department, to whose investigation and care our diplomatic relations have been committed, will, at as early a date as the facts will warrant, recognize the belligerency of those who are maintaining themselves in Cuba in armed opposition to Spain, and that the influence and offices of the United States may be prudently, peacefully, and effectively exerted to the end that Cuba may be enabled to establish a permanent government of her own choice.

That resolution was never voted on. On the 28th day of February, 1896, Senator J. Donald Cameron, of Pennsylvania, offered this resolution:

Resolved further, That the friendly offices of the United States should be offered by the President to the Spanish Government for the recognition of the independence of Cuba.

On February 28 the concurrent resolution was amended so as to include the provisions of Senator Cameron's resolution of that date, and as thus amended it passed the Senate by a vote of 64 yeas to 6 nays. I have at an earlier point in my remarks read the language of the resolution in the form in which it was finally passed.

Mr. President, during that session and up to the spring of 1897 this question was frequently before the Senate of the United States. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] introduced at various times several resolutions, which were not passed by the Senate; but on the 1st day of April, 1897, that Senator introduced the following resolution:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That a condition of public war exists between the Government of Spain and the government proclaimed and for some time maintained by force of arms by the people of Cuba, and that the United States of America shall maintain a strict neutrality between the contending powers, according to each all the rights of belligerents in the ports and territory of the United States.

That resolution passed the Senate on May 20, 1897, by 41 yeas to 14 nays. I have gone carefully over all the debates, and I can find only one place in the debates from 1896 up to 1898 where anybody suggested the annexation of Cuba to the United States. I understand that is what the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] mean when they say the Government was embarrassed because the reported resolution precluded annexation.

The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] said on March 3 that he favored the annexation of Cuba, but if that could not be accomplished to let Cuban independence speedily come.

On the 29th of March, 1898, Senator Allen introduced a joint resolution for the independence of Cuba. The Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] also introduced one. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] also introduced one. Every one of those resolutions directly or indirectly recognized a government in Cuba, and also recognized the fact that the Cubans were fighting for independence, and the resolutions approved it.

I do not think it is improper for me to say that the senior Senator from Ohio took a great deal of interest in this matter, and appeared before the Senate on several occasions urging that something should be done, and he always insisted that we should recognize the Republic of Cuba. I recall that he made some very able and very interesting remarks on that subject. He discussed the question in a statesmanlike manner, and he had the support in those views, I think, of a great majority of the Senate, as was shown by the subsequent action when we came to pass upon that question in the passage of the act. I have prepared and purposed to present some extracts not only from the Senator from Ohio but from other Senators. However, I shall not do so now.

I see the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] sitting in front of me——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. I yield.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know what purpose the Senator has in view by making remarks of the character he is now making and citing the RECORD as he does, but I will say to him that he need not go to trouble to make out by statement the case he makes out against me, for I surely did do all that the Senator has said, so far as I was able.

Mr. TELLER. I hope the Senator does not misunderstand me. I did not mean to make any complaint against him or anybody else. I meant to establish the fact, which I want to do before I close, that the fourth resolution which I offered, and which was criticised by the Senator from Minnesota and by the Senator from Nevada, and has been frequently criticised in newspapers, even to the extent of saying that it was a Democratic snap taken on the Senate, that it was absolutely in accord with the sentiment on both sides of the Senate. When I refer to the Senator, I do not refer to him in the way of criticism, but by way of approbation, for he was very potent and influential in securing the final result.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him for a moment at this point?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I will say that the fourth resolution, which was offered by the Senator from Colorado, was, at the time when it was offered, accepted by the committee without any objection.

Mr. TELLER. I was going to come to that. The Senator from Ohio was a member of the committee.

On the 3d day of April, 1898, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. QUAY] offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations be, and is hereby, instructed to report on or before the 5th instant a bill for the recognition of the independence of the republic of Cuba.

The Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] said:

Let Spain know that no settlement will ever be satisfactory to us that does not give absolute independence to these people.

The Senator from Georgia also said:

If Spain would not accept our mediation, or in case she did, and failed to harken to the voice of reason and humanity and give these people absolute independence, then we would have exhausted all peaceable means to accomplish our policy. Then we should at once acknowledge the independence of Cuba. If Spain resisted it, we should drive her army and navy from Cuban soil.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the date?

Mr. TELLER. The 3d of April, 1898.

I want it distinctly understood that I am not reading these extracts to find fault with any Senator, for I do not know that any

Senator ever departed from it. I only read them as a justification of the fourth resolution, to show that it was not inconsistent with the sentiment of the Senate nor was it inconsistent with the sentiment of the country.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. RAWLINS] on the same day said:

Mr. President, I rose simply for the purpose of setting forth in this desultory and informal way the reason why I thought we ought to pass a resolution recognizing the independence of Cuba and declaring war against Spain. (P. 3501, second column.)

On April 5 Senator Chandler said:

The United States ought immediately to declare war against Spain and to maintain that war until the people of Cuba are made free from Spanish starvation and cruelty and the government of the island firmly established as an independent republic. (Pp. 3547-3548.)

Senator Turpie, on the 5th of April, said:

More than a year ago I addressed the Senate in favor of the recognition of the independence of the Cuban Republic.

The Senators who are here will recall that address. It was, as we would expect from the author of it, a very remarkable address, and met, I think, the approbation of the great majority of this body.

The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART], referring to the platform of 1896, declared that it expressed the sentiment not only of the convention, but the sentiment of the country. In that I think he was nearer correct than he was the other day when he said that the resolution had been an embarrassment.

Senator Butler on the 11th of April offered a resolution which, among other things, contained this:

The Government of the United States hereby recognizes the Cuban Republic as a separate and independent nation.

And he said:

These resolutions express my feelings and sentiments, and I believe they express the feelings and sentiments of the American people. (P. 3703.)

On April 12, 1898, Senator Allen introduced a joint resolution requiring the President to take such steps as necessary to secure the immediate termination of hostilities in Cuba and an independent and stable government by the people thereof. (P. 3729.)

On the 13th of April the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested, if compatible with the public interest, to transmit to the Senate all diplomatic correspondence between the Government of the United States and the Government of the Kingdom of Spain respecting affairs in Cuba; and is also requested to inform the Senate whether or not this Government has ever submitted to the Government of Spain the proposition of Cuban independence, and if so, in what form such proposition was made, and under what conditions. (P. 3773.)

On the 13th day of April, 1898, Senator Davis, who was then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, offered the following resolution, with a report, which I will not stop to read:

Whereas the abhorrent conditions which have existed for more than three years in the island of Cuba, so near our own borders, have shocked the moral sense of the people of the United States, have been a disgrace to Christian civilization, culminating as they have in the destruction of a United States battle ship with 266 of its officers and crew while on a friendly visit in the harbor of Habana, and can not longer be endured, as has been set forth by the President of the United States in his message to Congress of April 11, 1898, upon which the action of Congress was invited: Therefore,

Resolved, etc., First. That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

Second. That it is the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States does hereby demand, that the Government of Spain at once relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

Third. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States, to such extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect. (P. 3773, with report.)

In the report the committee say:

The recognition of the independence of the people of Cuba is justified and demanded by the highest considerations of duty, right, and policy. (P. 3774.)

Also:

It is the opinion of your committee that the United States ought at once to recognize the independence of Cuba and ought to intervene. (P. 3774.)

The committee also state:

We have been assured by the same authority [Senators PROCTOR, GALLINGER, THURSTON, and MONEY] that the native Cubans, by superiority in education, are better qualified than the Spaniards, and are thoroughly capable to administer the government of the island. (P. 3774.)

The committee closed their report with the following:

First. That the people of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

Second. That it is the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States does hereby demand, that the Government of Spain at once relinquish its authority and government in the island of Cuba and withdraw its land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

Third. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, directed and empowered to use the entire land and naval forces of the United States, and to call into the actual service of the United States the militia of the several States to such an extent as may be necessary to carry these resolutions into effect.

Senators Turpie, Mills, DANIEL, and FORAKER concurred in the report, but expressed the opinion that the United States should immediately recognize the Republic of Cuba.

On the 13th of April, speaking on the committee report, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] said:

If a people be free and independent, as we have in this first proposition declared that the people of the island of Cuba are, they, and they alone, have power to establish their government. Independence and sovereignty go hand in hand, and any people who have independence have the capacity and the right to exercise sovereignty, and it is a denial of independence to say in the next breath after you have declared it that we will undertake, or we do hereby reserve the right and power, to establish for that independent people a government such as in our judgment and opinion may be stable.

I mention these points of difference because it is absolutely essential to an intelligent discussion that we should know what are the issues which have been joined. Without knowing what are the questions of difference we are groping in the dark.

Mr. President, the question before the Senate was whether we would declare that the Republic of Cuba existed.

On the same day the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said:

What kind of government can alone observe international obligations? Only an independent government, Mr. President. Therefore the President of the United States asks us to authorize him to use the Army and the Navy to stop the fighting in Cuba and establish an independent government in that island. (P. 3782, first column.)

Mr. President, not only was it the sentiment here, but the message which the President sent here, as claimed by the Senator from Massachusetts and not denied by anybody, was a declaration for the independence of Cuba and intervention on our part for its independence.

Senator Lindsay of Kentucky said:

The joint resolution declares that the people of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, a free and independent people, and to that extent I agree with the committee. (P. 3784, second column.)

He introduced a joint resolution, in part as follows:

That all such military operations should be carried on to the end that the independence of the Cuban Republic may be secured.

He recognized a government of some sort there.

Mr. President, there was some discussion at that time as to what might be our obligations if we recognized the Cuban government as a government. It was said by some Senators that the great debt Spain owed on account of Cuba, amounting to $600,000,000, might be saddled upon the new government of Cuba if we recognized her as a successor to the Spanish Government.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said:

I will not undertake to detain the Senate further than to say, with his leave, that I do not believe the President of the United States or any 10 men out of our 70,000,000 of population understand that the constraint which is spoken of is expected to be carried to the degree of assuming the government or control of that island.

There was some claim that one clause of the President's message might indicate that he proposed to put constraint both upon the Spaniards and upon the Cubans and to act as a mediator. I did not myself ever give that construction to it. I do not think that is what the President ever meant.

The Senator from Massachusetts continued:

We, as it seems to me, can no more be chargeable with the debts of Cuba or with the debts of Spain secured upon Cuba, if they are secured, than a fireman who puts out a fire in a house is liable for a mortgage on the house or a policeman who stops a row in a house and turns out an intruder is liable for the debts of the owner. (P. 3786, first column.)

On the 13th of April the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] offered a resolution directing the President to take steps to terminate hostilities in Cuba and to secure a stable and independent government for and by the people thereof.

On the same day Mr. ADAMS, in the House of Representatives, on behalf of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, etc., That the President is hereby authorized and directed to intervene at once to stop the war in Cuba, to the end and with the purpose of securing permanent peace and order there and establishing by the free action of the people thereof a stable and independent government of their own in the island of Cuba; and the President is hereby authorized and empowered to use the land and naval forces of the United States to execute the purpose of this resolution. (P. 3810, first column.)

The minority of the House Committee on Foreign Affairs reported another resolution, and section 1 was as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled—

SECTION 1. That the United States Government hereby recognizes the independence of the Republic of Cuba. (P. 3811.)

In it they urged the recognition of the Cuban republic. Without going to the RECORD, for I think I can state it accurately, on that proposition there were 150 yeas and 190 nays. It was not because the House did not believe that Cuba was to have a government of her own, but because some of the members of the House believed, as did some members of the Senate, that it might be embarrassing to us to recognize the government of Cuba and be compelled to conform our operations to its will and wishes. That was really the only complaint that was made, and the only reason, I may say, in my judgment, why we did not recognize that republic; and if any Senator thinks that I am mistaken about that I shall be very glad to hear what he has to say about it, because I regard it as an important point in this matter.

Mr. FORAKER. I remember that that point was insisted upon, but I never agreed that it was well taken.

Mr. TELLER. No. If the Senator from Ohio——

Mr. FORAKER. It always seemed to me to be an absurdity——

Mr. TELLER. The Senator from Ohio made a very interesting speech against that theory.

Mr. FORAKER. It always seemed to me an utter absurdity that an intervening power must take orders from either of the powers between whom it intervened.

Mr. SPOONER. But if you recognize independence before you intervene you are intervening then to assist a government which you have declared independent.

Mr. FORAKER. It never occurred to me that that changed the legal aspect of the situation. It seemed to me we had the right to intervene if we saw fit. If we simply intervened between Spain and her own subjects in rebellion, that was one thing in a legal aspect, and if we first recognized the independence of the Cubans and then intervened, it was the ordinary case of intervening between two belligerents, both of whom had recognized governmental organizations; and I do not understand that an intervening power is ever expected to take orders from either of the belligerents. I never conceded that point. I know it is a debatable proposition, and it was debated. I only wanted to avoid, by sitting here in silence, the inference that I acquiesced in that theory.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from Colorado will allow me, I do not think anybody will ever accuse the Senator from Ohio of having acquiesced.

Mr. FORAKER. Well.

Mr. TELLER. No.

Mr. SPOONER. But that proposition was elaborately debated——

Mr. FORAKER. I know it was.

Mr. SPOONER. And some of us sincerely entertained the opinion——

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. That there was a very wide difference between intervening between a parent State and a revolting colony for the purpose of aiding it to secure its independence and an intervention which was preceded by recognition of independence. It was the opinion of the President, which is quite clearly stated, that to recognize first the independence of Cuba before intervention would place us in a position which when we did intervene, would be subordinate and extremely embarrassing. Of course the Senator from Ohio had his view, and the rest of us had ours, and we were equally in favor of the independence of Cuba.

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Although——

Mr. FORAKER. I would not have thought it necessary to say anything if the Senator from Colorado had not called upon Senators to express themselves or otherwise forever hereafter to hold their peace, I suppose. I simply wanted to keep the record straight.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. FORAKER. If I may be allowed another word, it is one of those propositions about which there is plenty of room for legitimate difference of opinion and ground for argument. I took the view which I have stated, and the Senator from Wisconsin, with more success than I had, took the other view.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Ohio and I differed about it. I expect him always to think I am wrong and I know I shall always think he was wrong. But anyway we came out of it. But if my friend the Senator from Colorado will permit me a moment——

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. This proposition was stated in the debate, and abundantly sustained by authorities—writers upon international law—and although I may be mistaken, I have always supposed it had some influence with the Senator from Colorado in introducing what is called the fourth resolution, the wisdom of which I never have seen any reason to question, and that was this. I do not understand it was introduced as a pledge to the people of Cuba.

Mr. TELLER. No; it was not.

Mr. SPOONER. Because the people of Cuba demanded no pledge from the United States. They were in no position to demand a pledge from the United States. They had every reason to suppose that the people of the United States, intervening in the matter, did it with a high purpose to secure in the end the independence of the people of Cuba. But it is a principle of international law, well stated by Professor Lawrence, and important to all governments of the earth, most of which have colonies, that when a government intervenes by armed force between a parent state and a revolting colony, it must proceed upon the highest possible grounds and exclude all ulterior and selfish purposes. I so understood it, and on that theory I voted with great pleasure for the resolution offered by the Senator from Colorado as wise, as statesmanlike, and from my point of view it was of infinite consequence. We declared to the world that in stepping between Spain and her revolting colony we had no purpose in the end to make of Cuba an American asset. It is important to a government which holds colonies that this principle of international law should be strictly observed, and I believe, if my friend the Senator from Colorado will pardon me just a moment longer, that the resolution introduced by the Senator from Colorado, and its adoption by the Senate, had more to do than all other things in preventing a combination against us among the nations which held colonies.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Will the Senator from Colorado permit me for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I believe everybody in the Senate voted for the insertion of the resolution of the Senator from Colorado in the resolution which had been proposed by the committee. I believe the vote was unanimous.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator from Connecticut that the other day the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] stated that he dissented, but there was no roll call, and I supposed, as does the Senator from Connecticut, that everybody voted for it. It went nem. con., as it did when it got into the House.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I want to state what were my feeling and impression about it at the time. I felt that it was entirely unnecessary, and if I had any objection in my own mind to it at the time it was simply that it was unnecessary and perhaps indicated that there had been in the minds of some people an idea that we ourselves would acquire Cuba. That was the only objection I ever had to it, but I did not express that.

Mr. TELLER. On the 14th day of April——

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know that it is important, but my recollection is that there was no vote by roll call taken in the Senate on this particular resolution.

Mr. TELLER. There was not.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There was no division?

Mr. FORAKER. No. The Senator from Colorado offered it, and the Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis, having in charge the resolutions reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations, announced that he accepted it. It was accepted, and it was voted upon with the other resolutions when we finally reached them.

Mr. TELLER. That is practically correct, although not quite.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. There was no roll call.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I had the honor to address the Senate on this subject on the 15th day of April.

Mr. TELLER. That is the day I offered the resolution.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir. Upon that proposition I read from Lawrence, and it is well sustained, philosophical, logical, and reasonable in itself, this statement of the law of nations. May I read it?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. It is as follows:

> In the opinion of some writers, interventions undertaken on the ground of humanity and interventions for the purpose of putting a stop to religious persecutions are also legal. But we can not venture to bring them within the ordinary rules of international law. It certainly does not lay down that cruelty on the part of a government renders it liable to be deprived of its freedom of action, nor does it impose upon States the obligation of preventing either ordinary barbarity on the part of their neighbors or that special kind of inhumanity which takes the form of religious persecution.
> At the same time it will not condemn—

That is, international law—

> such interventions if they are undertaken with a single eye to the object in view and without ulterior considerations of self-interest and ambition. Should the cruelty be so long continued and so revolting—

As was this case—

> that the best instincts of human nature are outraged by it, and should an opportunity arise for bringing it to an end and removing its cause without adding fuel to the flame of the contest, there is nothing in the law of nations which will condemn as a wrongdoer the state which steps forward and undertakes the necessary intervention. Each case must be judged on its own merits.

And so, to put the Government on high ground and the intervention which brought about the independence of Cuba upon grounds which would justify us before the world, the Senator from Colorado introduced a resolution declaring that we would not take Cuba to ourselves, but that our object was to put an end to outrage and savagery and cruelty there, establish a government, and leave that people to control its own destiny. That is what they have wrought out.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, on the 14th instant, the day before I introduced the resolution, I discussed that question of international law, and declared, as the Senator has shown now, that we could not, according to the law of nations, without discrediting ourselves before the world, take any profits or have any advantage out of that intervention. At that time the public press of Europe was filled with declarations that we were not going to intervene in the interest of humanity, but we were going to intervene because we were aggressive and avaricious, and that we meant to take the island and appropriate it to our own use.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HALE. The Senator has been interrupted so much that I dislike to interrupt him further, but——

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HALE. What the Senator from Connecticut said a moment ago leads me now to make a statement. The Senator said he voted for the resolution, as nearly everybody did, and his only hesitation was that the situation was such that it seemed to be almost or quite superfluous to take any such attitude by a formal declaration of the Senate.

I do not quite agree with the Senator from Connecticut in that regard. I look upon it as a most providential thing in the course of this whole matter that the Senator from Colorado had the forethought, the prescience, to submit that resolution and attach it to the proceedings, and thereby make it for us a constraining force from that day to this. I believe that had it not been for that declaration always standing before us as an outright and express pledge and agreement Cuba to-day would not be a free Republic. Even with that declaration it is not until lately that I have been in my mind assured that we should speedily depart from Cuba and leave her to her own resources and to her own government.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] and I had a colloquy on this subject a little more than a year ago, in which I expressed the gravest doubt about the result, and the fear that the lust for empire, acquisition, and subjugation would get the better of us, and that we should not leave Cuba. I remember very well that I held the Senator as squarely as I could to it, and he was very frank in reply to state his position upon the question; and he did state then and there that he believed, and had the right to believe, and no one else had the right to have skepticism to the contrary, that we would not let that declaration be proven a legislative lie.

Mr. SPOONER. I was right, was I not?

Mr. HALE. And the Senator was right. My declaration would not have helped, but the Senator's declaration, made squarely and explicitly, did have an immense effect upon events, and it was a warning that was taken to all those who had secretly and determinedly set themselves against our departing from Cuba. The Senator from Colorado, for initiating this most beneficent proposition, and the Senator from Wisconsin, with the attitude that he held at that time, almost equal with him, are more to be thanked than any others for our having first made this promise and then kept it.

I do not agree that there never was any danger to the contrary, and if we had put on another declaration that under no circumstances should the war result in subjugation and conquest and the acquiring of territory, everybody would have voted for it. Nobody had the wisdom to put it on.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HALE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. TELLER. I do not want to yield for a speech. If the Senator wishes to ask a question I will yield, but I wish to conclude to-night.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was not necessary for the Senator to have said that at all. I had obtained the permission of the Senator from Maine to ask him a question.

Mr. TELLER. If the Senator wishes to ask a question, I will yield.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will not take the Senator's time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. TELLER. I was saying, when interrupted, that the press of all Europe was filled with denunciations of us and declarations that we were pretending to be moved by a spirit of humanity, but that we were really moved by a spirit of greed. I introduced the resolution without the slightest idea that there was any necessity to have any restraint upon ourselves. I never dreamed that there would arise in this country any number of people who would think of our taking the island in spite of the law that I, and subsequently the Senator from Wisconsin, laid down as binding. I see the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM] before me. I remember that he took the same position we did. All were for the independence of Cuba and nobody was for the annexation of the island or holding it in a Territorial condition or in subordination except as the resolution declared, until there had been a proper pacification of the island.

Now, Mr. President, it was a question for the Administration to determine when there was a proper pacification, and I did not share the fear of the Senator from Maine. I felt all the time, as the Senator from Wisconsin did, that under no circumstances was it possible for the American people, in the face of this well-known principle of international law, in the face of that declaration which went out to the world—and I believe it did have some influence upon foreign thought and foreign sentiment—ever to think of holding those people by annexation.

Mr. President, since those events there has been considerable discussion in the public press as to what our danger was at that time. I think the danger was perhaps greater than we anticipated then. I believe there was considerable danger of a combination of powers of the world against us in a way that probably would not have prevented our intervention, but it would have been exceedingly embarrassing to us at least.

I did not mean to say this—it comes in a little incidentally—but I will say that I am not one of those who believe very much in the friendship of nations. In all my reading I have never found a nation forgetting its interest. I have never found a nation anywhere that forgot its own interest and that did not put its interest ahead of that of anybody else. That is what every nation must do. You may talk about unity of blood and of language and of religion and all those things. They do not count in the struggle between nation and nation, and never have done so in the history of the world. We saw in our day and generation the people of the United States divided into two hostile camps. We have seen other people, speaking the same language, worshiping at the same altar, having the same traditions, going into a contest with each other when their interest demanded it.

I felt then that we were in some danger, but I believe we were in greater danger than I had ever supposed.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me just a moment?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to this. There can not be among nations any principle of international law more vital than that principle which is enunciated in his resolution. The nations of the earth which hold colonies, and which are confronted from time to time by insurrections, could not tolerate at all the doctrine that a separate independent nation could intervene between them and a revolting colony for purposes of annexation. It could not be tolerated at all. So I repeat I have looked upon the resolution of the Senator from Colorado as having prevented foreign concert against us in our Cuban intervention.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly, I yield.

Mr. BACON. With the permission of the Senator from Colorado, I think the narrative now being made by him—a résumé of what occurred at that important period—is not only very interesting, but very valuable, and I desire, with his permission, to make a slight contribution to a part of that history. I have reference particularly to the part of it which relates to the danger the United States were then in of becoming involved in war with European powers.

I have no definite knowledge, of course, as to how great that danger was, but the particular thing I desire to contribute in this connection is the fact which was within my personal knowledge, and I presume within the personal knowledge of a number of other Senators, that Mr. McKinley very gravely apprehended such a danger at that time. He was extremely reluctant to have us enter upon a war. At that period there was a greater disregard, of course, of that usual recognition of differences in party lines than at other times, and Mr. McKinley was in the habit of sending for Senators and Representatives for the purpose of conferring with them as to what the best course might be to be pursued.

On one day he sent for the then Senator from West Virginia, Mr. Faulkner, and myself, and we met him by appointment in what is known as the Cabinet room, where there was a very free interchange of views, more particularly an expression from him, of course, which lasted possibly for an hour. In that interview Mr. McKinley very strongly impressed us the apprehension which he felt that the European nations might become so alarmed at what they considered to be the aggressive policy of the United States, and regarding it as a move for the purpose of depriving Spain of one of her colonies, they might unite in a war against us. That view was very plainly expressed and repeated by him. I remember very distinctly what occurred as we left. When walking toward the front door of the room he walked with us, and as he stood by the open door I shall never forget his last words, which I remember not only in substance, but in accurate verbiage, which were: "Remember, Senators, if this war breaks out it may be a world's war."

That was his expression made to us, and I thought possibly in connection with the statement and narration made by the Senator from Colorado this statement might not be without some value.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAPP. I should like to ask the Senator from Colorado a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. TELLER. I yield.

Mr. CLAPP. These questions are not asked in any captious spirit, but they arise upon the merits of the Senator's discussion. I believe the Senator from Colorado opposed the so-called Platt amendment a year ago last March. Am I correct in that supposition?

Mr. TELLER. Yes.

Mr. CLAPP. Now, I will ask the Senator if one of the reasons for opposing that amendment was not the fact that in his opinion it would be inconsistent, we having passed the so-called Teller resolution?

Mr. TELLER. I gave as one of the reasons, perhaps, that it was inconsistent with the resolution.

Mr. CLAPP. I call it the Teller resolution; it is known as the Teller resolution. Now, I will ask the Senator if he is not satisfied that the present condition involving the Platt amendment and such recognition as was made of it is better than to have acknowledged the independence of Cuba without the restraint or restriction or relation involved in the so-called Platt amendment?

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, that has nothing to do with what I have been saying, and I do not intend to enter into a discussion of it at all.

On the 14th day of April, 1898, having discussed this question of international law, I also declared that I hoped somebody would offer a resolution of the general character I offered on the subsequent day. Nobody having offered it on the 15th of the month, I offered it. On the 14th day of April the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] said:

> Mr. President, I am therefore prepared to support the resolutions of the House, if I have correctly interpreted them. I should like a little better the form which has been drawn up, I understand, by the honorable Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER]. It appeared in the papers, and I suppose I violate no propriety in saying that it appeared with his consent or his authority. I like that, which, I think, is a perfect expression of the limits and the extent to which it is necessary for us to go, and I think when we go that far, all other things will be added to us and all other things will be added by the inevitable and inexorable logic of events that are desired by the friends of freedom in Cuba (p. 3835, first column).

On the same date the then Senator from South Dakota, Mr. Pettigrew, offered a resolution, the first part of which is as follows:

> First. That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent, and the Government of the United States hereby recognizes the Republic of Cuba as the true and lawful government of the island (p. 3840, second column).

On the same day the then Senator from Delaware, Mr. Gray, said:

> We can not guard against every human eventuality, but we can take care that a government formed under our supervision and care and tutelage shall be such a government as will be just not only to this country, but to those for whom we have concern on the score of humanity in the territory over which that government extends. I do not believe that there is any thought now or that there ever has been any thought that we are forever, after this matter shall be accomplished, to exercise a protectorate or suzerainty over that island or any government which may be set up there under our auspices (p. 3842, second column).

Again, he said:

> I agree that the people of the island of Cuba of right ought to be free and independent. I wish to God that I could say that they are. I do not believe it (p. 3843, second column).

On the 14th of April the senior Senator from Indiana [Mr. FAIRBANKS] said:

> Sir, no one will distrust our motives in taking this step. We do not intervene for revenge, for the acquisition of territory, for the extension of our authority and power. Our past history is ample proof of this (p. 3846, first column).

On the same date House joint resolution No. 233, which subsequently became the law, was laid on the table, to be taken up on motion (p. 3847).

Senator Gray said, on the 15th:

> If out of intervention on that account shall come, as it must come, the independence of the Cuban republic, then every American heart will rejoice and every American will applaud (p. 3888, first column).

Again he said, quoting from the President's message, wherein the President asked Congress to take steps to terminate hostilities:

> That can mean nothing else than a government free and independent from the control of Spain or from the control of any other country whatever, and on that account I was willing to take the President's recommendation, etc. (p. 3888, second column).

The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] on the same day called attention to the Senate resolution concerning Cuba in 1896 and the House resolution (p. 3889, first column). He also called attention to the joint resolution of the Senate of May 20, 1897, declaring, by a vote of 64 to 14, that a state of war existed between Spain and the government of Cuba.

On the same day the then junior Senator from Colorado [Mr. Wolcott] said:

> All these things we must count in advance, and we have counted them. And when the day of the result shall come and Cuba is free, as we must make her free, we will have fought a country which can never indemnify us by land, for we want no land beyond our border; a country which can never indemnify us in money, for she has got no money. We must find our only satisfaction, and it must be the supreme satisfaction of a free people, in this, that we have poured out our blood and our treasurers to relieve the cry of suffering humanity.
> The war which is already upon us, whatever the phraseology of our resolutions, must be fought because it is the manifest destiny of this Republic to stand forever upon the Western Hemisphere a sentinel of liberty. It must come, because if we fail to listen to the voice of the suffering or the cry of the downtrodden upon this continent, we shall be untrue to those principles of liberty, humanity, and Christianity, upon which this country is founded as upon a rock (p. 3893, first column).

On the 16th of April I offered to amend the resolution of the committee by what has since been known as the fourth resolution of the joint resolution. In the second resolution of the committee I moved to add, "hereby disclaiming any disposition or intention to exercise jurisdiction or control over said island except for the pacification thereof, and a determination when that is accomplished to leave the government and control of the island to the people thereof" (p. 3954.)

This is as the law now stands, except the word "sovereignty" is added before the word "jurisdiction" and the words "asserts its" are added before the words "a determination."

On the same day Senator Pasco said:

> We can make no better beginning than by declaring at the outset that the republic is free and independent (p. 3909, second column).

On the same day the then Senator from Nebraska, Mr. Thurston, said:

> When the Stars and Stripes go up on Cuban soil, I want our flag to share equally the free air of Cuba with another flag that bears a single star. Under the flags of two Republics, acknowledged before all the world, humanity and liberty will be safe and secure.

The RECORD of the Senate of April 16 shows that the committee resolution was, by a vote of yeas 51, nays 37, amended by adding:

> And the Government of the United States hereby recognizes the Republic of Cuba as the true and lawful Government of that island.

After this vote was taken, Senator Davis of Minnesota, the chairman of the committee, offered the fourth resolution, which is in the exact language of the amendment I had given notice of, except, as I before stated, the word "sovereignty" was inserted before "jurisdiction," and the word "asserts," which I had omitted, was inserted to make the resolution read properly, otherwise the resolution of Senator Davis is exactly as I introduced it. That resolution of mine was made, as the Senator from Ohio has said, the action of the committee. I did not offer it, but I had given notice that I would offer it, and I introduced it and had it printed; but the Senator from Minnesota, then chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, presented the resolution to the Senate, of course with my approval.

I had said to him that I thought its effect abroad would be better if the resolution came from the Committee on Foreign Relations than if it came from a single Senator; that I had no pride of authorship in the matter; that all I was desirous of doing was to secure results, and that if he would introduce the resolution as coming from the committee, in my judgment it would be very much better than for me or any other Senator to introduce it. He said, "I should like to insert the word 'sovereignty' before the word 'jurisdiction,'" and he did add the word "sovereignty," and I added the word "asserts" before the words "its determination," to make the resolution read properly; and it so passed.

Mr. ALLISON. Has the Senator examined the RECORD carefully as to the final disposition of that resolution?

Mr. TELLER. I have examined the RECORD carefully, and the RECORD shows that Senator Davis took up the matter. He did not say that he reported it in behalf of the committee, but I understood at the time that he had consulted the committee regarding it.

Mr. ALLISON. I am very glad to have the Senator say that, because otherwise I should have said the Senator from Colorado had in his place in the Senate offered the resolution, and the then Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Davis] stood in another part of the Chamber and said he accepted it. As, however, the Senator from Colorado has examined the RECORD, I will yield to him; but that would have been my testimony if I had been called on as a witness before hearing the Senator's statement.

Mr. TELLER. I could turn to it; but it is so late that it is hardly worth while to do so now.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not ask the Senator to turn to it. I have no desire to have him do so to-night. I understood the Senator from Colorado offered that resolution in open Senate.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator refer to the resolution known as the Teller resolution?

Mr. ALLISON. I do.

Mr. TELLER. On the day we voted I find this in the RECORD:

So Mr. Turpie's amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer an amendment to the pending joint resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Davis] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the joint resolution add the following paragraph:

"Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. Davis.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRYE. I move to strike out in line first of the joint resolution the words "are, and;" so that, if amended, the paragraph would read:

"First. That the people of the island of Cuba of right ought to be free and independent," etc.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FRYE] upon the table.

The yeas and nays being taken on the motion, the yeas were 55 and the nays 33; so that the amendment of the Senator from Maine was laid on the table.

Mr. ALLISON. I yield to the Senator. The RECORD seems to be in his favor, but I know perfectly well there was no debate upon the resolution at that time.

Mr. TELLER. No; but there had been some debate on it before then, though there was no debate when the vote was taken.

Mr. ALLISON. It was well understood in the Chamber by all of us that the resolution was really the amendment of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER].

Mr. TELLER. That is true.

Mr. ALLISON. And that it was agreed to when offered by the then Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis.

Mr. CULLOM. Will the Senator from Colorado allow me one remark?

Mr. TELLER. I will.

Mr. CULLOM. I remember very well the whole story of the connection of the Senator from Colorado with this amendment and of the connection of the Committee on Foreign Relations with it. I have always thought and believed that that amendment, while it seemed at that time to be somewhat questionable, would do, as it has done, more to keep this country from insisting upon the annexation of the island of Cuba, and also to keep other nations from insisting that we had some selfish purpose in our course in reference to it, than anything else that could have been done, except the war itself.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have but a few more words to say. We added to the House resolution a recognition of the Republic of Cuba. The House disagreed to the amendment; and when it came back to the Senate, the Senate adhered to its amendment by a vote of 42 to 35, which ultimately we receded from. There was some debate upon that, which it is not worth while, perhaps, now to insert.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will allow me, he will remember that all of us in the debate agreed to the declaration that Cuba of right ought to be free and independent, but many of us denied it to be a fact that Cuba was free and independent.

Mr. CULLOM. That is so.

Mr. TELLER. There was a motion to strike out the words "are, and;" so that the amendment would read:

That the people of the island of Cuba of right ought to be free and independent.

That was voted down. We insisted that the Cubans not only had a right to be, but they were, free and independent.

Mr. SPOONER. I recollect I claimed that if they were free and independent there would be no occasion for us going to war, but that they ought of right to be free and independent, and that we were going to war to make them free and independent.

Mr. TELLER. In that connection I want to call attention to what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] said, because I think it represents the views of those who wanted to recognize the independence of Cuba, as I did. In the debate on the 20th of April he said:

I felt in dealing with this question at this time we had a right to recognize that Government, and that it was our duty to recognize that Government. I think it was unfortunate that we did not recognize it, but it may not be as unfortunate as I imagined, for I think quickly, speedily, possibly even now, on the very day when the ultimatum has been sent to Spain pursuant to the resolutions that passed here, this Government has practically recognized the Republic of Cuba, and I think possibly it is true—we will all know it by to-morrow morning—that that Government is to-day being officially dealt with by the official representatives of this Government, as it should be (p. 4065, second column).

The Senator from Ohio also read a very interesting statement from a speech made by Senator Sherman as to the condition of the government in Cuba in 1896, which I shall not put in.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me once more, and I will not interrupt him again? I want to read what President McKinley said in his message upon the question.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator may do that.

Mr. SPOONER. This is what President McKinley said:

To commit this country now to the recognition of any particular government in Cuba might subject us to embarrassing conditions of international obligation toward the organization so recognized. In case of intervention our conduct would be subject to the approval or disapproval of such government. We would be required to submit to its direction and to assume to it the mere relation of a friendly ally.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want to too much interrupt the Senator from Colorado——

Mr. TELLER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] has stated the views that he and other Senators contended for as expressed by the President in his message. There is one other feature of that message which I think it is due to history that attention should be called to in this connection, if this is to be a historical review of that time, as it seems to be.

The great point of difference between the President and some of the Senators, of whom I was one, was as to the character of our intervention. The President, as I understood him, favored neutral intervention, as contradistinguished from intervention in hostility to Spain, his idea being, as I understood from his message and as I understood from private interviews I had with him, that, if we intervened at all, it should only be to go down to Cuba and say to the belligerents: "Cease fighting, abide together in peace, and restore order;" and in support of that view I want to read a paragraph or two from the same message which the Senator from Wisconsin has read, if I will not too much interrupt the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. TELLER. Go on.

Mr. FORAKER. Following immediately after where the Senator from Wisconsin left off, President McKinley said, in his message of April 11, 1898, as follows:

When it shall appear hereafter that there is within the island a government capable of performing the duties and discharging the functions of a separate nation, and having, as a matter of fact, the proper forms and attributes of nationality, such government can be promptly and readily recognized and the relations and interests of the United States with such nation adjusted.

There remain the alternative forms of intervention to end the war, either as an impartial neutral by imposing a rational compromise between the contestants, or as the active ally of the one party or the other.

As to the first, it is not to be forgotten that during the last few months the relation of the United States has virtually been one of friendly intervention in many ways, each not of itself conclusive, but all tending to the exertion of a potential influence toward an ultimate pacific result, just and honorable to all interests concerned. The spirit of all our acts hitherto has been an earnest, unselfish desire for peace and prosperity in Cuba, untarnished by differences between us and Spain, and unstained by the blood of American citizens.

The forcible intervention of the United States as a neutral to stop the war, according to the large dictates of humanity and following many historical precedents where neighboring States have interfered to check the hopeless sacrifices of life by internecine conflicts beyond their borders, is justifiable on rational grounds. It involves, however, hostile constraint upon both the parties to the contest as well to inforce a truce as to guide the eventual settlement.

Mr. President, I understood the message of President McKinley at the time to mean that if we went into Cuba we were to go there for the purpose of exercising hostile restraint to whatever extent might be necessary against the Cubans as well as against the Spaniards. That is the reason I could not consent to that proposition, and that is a proposition I combat now. That I am not mistaken in that I want to show by just reading one extract from the annual message of the President of December 5, 1898, in which, reviewing the steps leading up to the war, which had in the meanwhile occurred and been concluded, the President said, speaking of this message of April 11, 1898:

I again reviewed the alternative courses of action which had been proposed, concluding that the only one consonant with international policy and compatible with our firm-set historical traditions was intervention as a neutral to stop the war and check the hopeless sacrifice of life, even though that resort involved "hostile constraint upon both the parties to the contest, as well to enforce a truce as to guide the eventual settlement."

Before the President made that recommendation, found as I have read it in his message of April 11, 1898, I had learned from personal interviews with him what his view was, and that, when coming to address Congress in that regard, he would so express himself. It was in anticipation of that, on the 29th day of March, 1898, after I had learned what we were to expect, that I introduced the resolution of that date, which I should like to put into the RECORD, if the Senator from Colorado does not feel that I am trespassing too far at this point.

Mr. TELLER. I have no objection to the Senator reading the resolutions.

Mr. FORAKER. The resolutions are as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America:

1. That the people of the island of Cuba are, and of right ought to be, free and independent.

2. That the Government of the United States hereby recognizes the Republic of Cuba as the true and lawful government of that island.

3. That the war Spain is waging against Cuba is so destructive of the commercial and property interests of the United States, and so cruel, barbarous, and inhuman in its character as to make it the duty of the United States to demand, and the Government of the United States hereby does demand, that she at once withdraw her land and naval forces from Cuba and Cuban waters.

4. That the President of the United States be, and he hereby is, authorized, empowered, and directed to use, if necessary, the entire land and naval forces of the United States to carry these resolutions into effect.

In other words, Mr. President, in view of what I have said, it will now be perfectly plain to everybody that it was my purpose, in so far as I had any capacity to control events at that time, to so order events here in the Congress of the United States that instead of having a neutral intervention, so that the Cubans and the Spaniards were both to remain there, as suggested, the intervention of the United States should be an intervention in hostility to Spain and to drive her out. That drew the line and raised the question over which there has been so much controversy.

Mr. TELLER. I do not desire to detain the Senate longer, except to say that as to the fourth resolution, it was adopted here by practically a unanimous vote, and when it went to the House of Representatives it was unanimously adopted there. I understand that portion of the resolution never was in controversy, but the whole controversy between the House and the Senate was as to the recognition of the Cuban Republic.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I have not followed the Senator's discussion to-day all the way through. I have been detained from the Chamber until now. I wish to take this opportunity, by the courtesy of the Senator, to say that I thought when the Senate adopted the fourth resolution, which was drafted by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] and presented by the late Senator from Minnesota, Mr. Davis, it was an eminently wise and timely measure.

Events have since confirmed my judgment as to its wisdom, and I think the American people will approve of it in the future. It was a declaration to all the world of the high motives that inspired the Government of the United States in entering upon a war with Spain to free Cuba. No matter what the future of Cuba may be, our record is above and beyond reproach. The Congress meant what it said, and we have kept the faith. We went to Cuba to free her people from Spanish misrule, not to seize the island. We declared war in the name of humanity and with no purpose of territorial aggrandizement nor with any ulterior designs. Our exalted purpose was frankly proclaimed, and to it we have steadfastly adhered.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, in my public life—and it has not been a very short one—I have never seen greater unanimity than was exhibited on the occasion of the passage of the resolutions to accomplish what the President had declared. Everybody felt that it was an important and a somewhat critical period. We knew we were going into a war. The feeling in the Senate was—of course I can not speak of the feeling in the other body, but I believe it was the same there—the feeling in the Senate was universal that we would stand by the Government in its efforts to carry out the provisions of those resolutions.

I want to read what I said at that time. After we had voted there was some question raised as to whether there was to be any partisanship in the matter. I disclaimed any desire to secure any partisan advantage out of anything in connection with the entire affair, and I disclaim it now, Mr. President. The then Senator from Maryland, Mr. Gorman, made a very patriotic speech, stating that it was his desire, and that he hoped it would be the desire of everybody here, to stand by the Administration, although we might not agree with everything that the Administration had done or might do.

I felt if war came I was not responsible for it. I had not done anything in my public relation to the Administration that could possibly be construed into impatience or pressure upon it.

I had waited with patience and with confidence that the Government in the examination as to who was responsible for the blowing up of the Maine would act justly and intelligently, and it ultimately did. I had said to the President of the United States that no act of mine and, so far as I could prevent it, no act of the party with which I was cooperating should embarrass him in any effort he wished to make to bring about a solution of that difficulty without war. I said to him that we would wait. When he said to me, "How long will you wait?" I said: "Mr. President, we will wait just so long as you say there is hope of bringing freedom to those people and relieving them of their distress by negotiations." We did wait until the President sent his message of the 11th of April, in which he said he had exhausted every effort.

Now, I will read what I said. This was the language I used:

Mr. President, I am going to do as the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Gorman] said the other day he was going to do. I am going to forget that William McKinley was elected President on the Republican ticket. More than that, I am going to forget the methods by which he was elected; I am going to forget the class of men who stood back of him and by him; I am going to forget a hundred things that I have criticised; I am going to put them back of me, and I am going to stand up for every effort of his to maintain the integrity, honor, and dignity of the American people, and I believe every Senator on this floor has the same sentiments that I utter (p. 4099, second column).

That was true. If we have had controversies arising since, which we have, we had none then; and if we had been fortunate enough to escape a conflict of arms in the Asiatic sea we should have no controversy now. I disclaim for myself any desire to make any partisan profit or advantage out of that unfortunate condition in the Asiatic islands. I glory in the act of the Administration in finally putting in operation the Republic of Cuba. I think it is a great thing, and I think it is worth boasting of, if any nation is entitled to boast, that we have put back of us the cry of greed and avarice, which would have induced us to forget not only our obligations under international law, but our obligations under a solemn promise, not made, as the Senator from Wisconsin says, to Cuba, but made to all mankind—made as much to our own people as it was to Cuba and made as much to every nation on the face of the earth as it was to Cuba.

Mr. President, I have waited patiently, sometimes feeling that there was too much tardiness in this matter, and yet I believe I can say that I have never made public criticism of any kind touching the delay of the Government in regard to the matter. The final happy solution of our occupation and of our attempt to put those people in order for a government of their own I think I may say has justified the delay, and I have no complaint to make of it.

I prepared to make a speech on this subject immediately after the Platt amendment passed, because I was somewhat sensitive when I saw in the great public press that I was charged with having put in the resolution with the purpose of embarrassing the Administration and taking a snap on the Senate, and that it was an indication of my hostility to the Republican Administration. I looked up the speeches of Senators—every one of them—and was prepared to make a speech probably twice or three times as long as my speech to-day has been, when the present Presiding Officer [Mr. PLATT of Connecticut] and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], on my saying to them that I was going to make it, said: "We fear if you make that speech it will embarrass the situation in the island of Cuba." I should have made a very different speech from that I have made to-day. I was somewhat sensitive over the criticism, and I should probably have said some things that might not have been wise and which I have no occasion to say now. When the Senators said that I said to them: "I have no desire to add any embarrassments. On the contrary, it is my anxiety not to do so, and I will refrain from saying anything about it until the conditions are such that I can do so."

I never could do it better than now, when the American flag has come down from Cuba, but, better still, a flag for Cuba has gone up. The American flag is the best flag in the world for Americans. It is not the best flag for men who do not want it. It is not the best flag for Cuba. Cuba's flag, not representing a hundredth part of the power or glory of ours, is the flag for Cuba, and when the Filipinos shall put up their flag and ours shall come down, as I believe it will some day, it will be a better flag to them than ours can be, although you may administer your Government with all the kindness and all the wisdom of which human beings are capable. The best flag is the flag that the men themselves put up. It is the only flag that ought to command the admiration and the love and the affection of the men who live under it, and it is the only flag that will. Liberty-loving men will never have any love for a flag that they do not create and that they do not defend.

During the course of Mr. TELLER's speech,

Mr. CULLOM said: Mr. President, I desire to ask unanimous consent of the Senate that I be allowed, after the remarks of the Senator from Colorado shall have been concluded, to have inserted in the RECORD an article from the North American Review of April, 1901, written by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. BEVERIDGE], giving a history of the whole Cuban affair from start to finish. I should like to have it inserted in the RECORD, so that it may be referred to hereafter.

Mr. TELLER. The Senator can insert it in the RECORD without any objection on my part.

Mr. CULLOM. Very well. I ask that the article may be printed in the RECORD after the remarks of the Senator from Colorado. It consists of some 14 or 15 pages.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois asks unanimous consent for permission to print in the RECORD the article referred to by him after the remarks of the Senator from Colorado. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The article referred to is as follows:

[From the North American Review, April, 1901.]

CUBA AND CONGRESS.

[By ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE, United States Senator from Indiana.]

To appreciate the moderation and restraint of the Cuban legislation of Congress, it is necessary to consider the previously defined national policy of the United States respecting Cuba. To this national policy American statesmen of all political parties have given continuous expression. Jefferson led off in 1808 by deprecating the acquisition of Cuba by any other power than Spain. In 1809 he was discussing whether Napoleon would "consent to our receiving Cuba into our nation." The thought steadily grew with him until in 1823 he announced the settled conviction of the country, which every American statesman has followed. He said:

"I have ever looked on Cuba as the most interesting addition which could ever be made to our system of States. The control which, with Florida Point, this island would give us over the Gulf of Mexico and the countries and isthmus bordering on it would fill up the measure of our political well-being. Her addition to our confederacy is exactly what is wanting to advance our power as a nation to the point of its utmost interest."

Monroe suggested the ownership of Cuba as a military necessity. The acquisition of Cuba was the chief aim of Pierce's foreign policy. The main effort of Polk's Administration was to purchase this island. The movement was confined to no one political party. John Quincy Adams, in a formal letter, as Secretary of State, said, in 1823, of Cuba:

"Its commanding position with reference to the Gulf of Mexico and the West India seas, the character of its population, its situation midway between our southern coast and the island of Santo Domingo, its safe and capacious harbor of Habana, fronting a long line of our shores destitute of the same advantage, the nature of its products and of its wants, furnishing the supplies and needing the returns of a commerce immensely profitable and mutually beneficial—give it an importance in the sum of our national interests with which that of no other foreign territory can be compared and little inferior to that which binds the different members of this Union together. Such, indeed, are, between the interests of that island and of this country, the geographical, commercial, moral, and political relations formed by nature, gathering in the process of time and even now (1823) verging to maturity, that, looking forward to the probable course of events for the short period of half a century, it is scarcely possible to resist the conviction that the annexation of Cuba to our Federal Republic will be indispensable to the continuance and integrity of the Union itself."

Mr. Adams then showed that at that particular time we were not prepared for this event, but added:

"If an apple, severed by the tempest from its native tree, can not but fall to the ground, Cuba, forcibly disjointed from its own unnatural connection with Spain and incapable of self-support, can gravitate only toward the North American Union, which by the same law of nature can not cast her from its bosom."

Henry Clay, as Secretary of State, in 1825, nervously anxious as he then was, for political reasons, to state his views mildly, nevertheless said in a formal letter as Secretary of State:

"If the war should continue between Spain and the new republics, and those islands (Cuba and Porto Rico) should become the object and theater of it, their fortunes have such a connection with the prosperity of the United States that they could not be indifferent spectators; and the possible contingencies of such a protracted war might bring upon the Government of the United States duties and obligations the performance of which, however painful it should be, they might not be at liberty to decline."

Even Mr. Van Buren, that fox of American statesmanship, who never said anything that was not susceptible of different meanings, said as Secretary of State in 1829:

"The Government of the United States has always looked with the deepest interest upon the fate of those islands, but particularly upon Cuba. Its geographical position, which places it almost in sight of our southern shores, and, as it were, gives it command of the Gulf of Mexico and the West India seas, its safe and capacious harbors, its rich productions, the exchange of which for our surplus agricultural products and manufactures constitutes one of the most extensive and valuable branches of our foreign trade, render it of the utmost importance to the United States that no change should take place in its condition which might injuriously affect our political and commercial standing in that quarter."

In 1848 Buchanan in a formal letter, as Secretary of State, said:

"If Cuba were annexed to the United States we would not only be relieved from the apprehensions which we can never cease to feel for our own safety and the security of our commerce while it shall remain in its present condition, but human foresight can not anticipate the beneficial consequences which would result to every portion of our Union. This can never become a local question. With suitable fortification at the Tortugas, and in possession of the strongly fortified harbor of Habana as a naval station on the opposite coast of Cuba, we could command the outlet of the Gulf of Mexico, between the peninsula of Florida and that island. This would afford ample security both to the foreign and coasting trade of the Western and Southern States, which seek a market for their surplus productions through the ports of the Gulf. Under the Government of the United States Cuba would become the richest and most fertile island of the same extent throughout the world."

In 1859 the Committee on Foreign Relations of the United States Senate reported favorably a bill "to facilitate the acquisition of the island of Cuba," in which report the committee said:

"The ultimate acquisition of Cuba may be considered a fixed purpose of the United States; a purpose resulting from political and geographical necessities, which have been recognized by all parties and all administrations, and in regard to which the popular voice has been expressed with a unanimity unsurpassed on any question of national policy that has heretofore engaged the public mind. The purchase and annexation of Louisiana led, as a necessary corollary, to that of Florida, and both point with unerring certainty to the acquisition of Cuba."

And further on, in considering the question of constitutional power, the committee quoted the famous words of Thomas Jefferson:

"I am persuaded that no constitution was ever before so well calculated as ours for extensive empire and self-government."

The slavery question was at this juncture thrust into this national movement; but even that was not sufficient to make the minority of the committee, headed by Mr. Seward, protest against the acquisition of Cuba. That was the most remarkable circumstance in this whole discussion, for if anything could have induced Mr. Seward and the abolitionists to attack the proposition its advocacy by the slave power would have done it. But in expressing the views of the minority of the committee Mr. Seward merely reported a short bill as a substitute for the majority bill, directing the President—

"To communicate to the Senate the condition of the relations which shall then (next session) be subsisting between the United States and Spain, and of any negotiations that may then be pending for the cession of Cuba to the United States, together with such statements of the conditions of the Treasury, and also of the effective condition of the Army and Navy of the United States, as may enable Congress to judge whether at that time it will be necessary to adopt any extraordinary measures to maintain the rights and promote the interests of the United States, connected with or growing out of their relations to Spain."

In the same year Judah P. Benjamin demonstrated that the United States must possess Cuba as a measure of safety. He said:

"Her harbors not only furnish points of rendezvous for hostile fleets, but secure harbors of refuge in which they could refit and repair, and prepare themselves for fresh attacks on our unprotected coasts. It was those harbors that afforded refuge for the British fleet after its descent on New Orleans; and in them did the French fleet refit after its bombardment of the castle of San Juan d'Ulloa. In the event of a rupture with Great Britain, this would be, in her possession, a tremendous point of vantage for attack. It is for these reasons that the instincts of the American people have already taught them that we shall ever be insecure against hostile attack until this important geographical and military position is placed under our protection and control."

Benjamin was a proslavery man, but Edward Everett was an antislavery man; and yet, as Secretary of State, in a formal letter in his official capacity, Everett said:

"Cuba lies at our doors. It commands the approaches to the Gulf of Mexico, which washes the shores of five of our States. It bars the entrance to that great river which drains all of the North American continent. Geographically and commercially Cuba would, in our hands, be an extremely valuable possession. Under certain contingencies it might be almost essential to our safety."

But he says that, for "domestic reasons (slavery)," the acquisition of Cuba "at the present time" (1852) was impracticable.

Stephen A. Douglas (Democrat) was earnestly for annexation in 1851, and Clayton (Whig) spoke of the future annexation of Cuba as a certainty. William L. Marcy believed that if he could secure the acquisition of Cuba while Secretary of State that single stroke would make him President. And the effort of the life of the "great Secretary" was directed to this end.

The tremendous internal questions following the civil war diverted the attention of the American people for almost a generation from their national policy of expansion, and for thirty years there was a dearth of expression upon the subject. But the instinctive purpose of the people asserted itself as soon as conditions within the present boundaries of the Republic had become normal. Accordingly, during the last ten years, expressions similar to the above, and directed to expansion generally, have begun to come again from men of weight and judgment, growing in volume and vigor up to the present hour. With these the public is so familiar that space can not be spared to quote them.

The fact back of these expressions and giving them meaning and vitality is that they were the voice of the American people. This whole historic movement has been the expression of the purpose of the people and not the plan of politicians. As early as 1739 the American colonists petitioned England to let them capture Cuba, which they called in their petition "that key to all America."

In 1762, when the English captured Habana, they did it with the aid of American troops; and the event caused great rejoicing throughout the American colonies, the greatest public demonstration of all being held by the people of Boston. During our Revolutionary war our ships and fleets found harbor and refuge in Cuba. From the beginning it has been with the greatest difficulty that our Presidents have held our impatient people in leash. Taylor and Fillmore issued proclamations forbidding American expeditions against Cuba. De Bow, in his Commercial Review, at the period of its greatest influence, declared that "public opinion is uniform and unanimous that the safety and security of the United States demand the annexation of Cuba." And yet De Bow himself was hostile to the proposition. He was merely recording a fact as an editorial observer. Democratic newspapers in the South and Whig newspapers in the North, agreeing on nothing else, agreed upon this. The Whig New York Times, in an editorial in 1852, criticised Fillmore for not acquiring Cuba, and the New York Tribune quoted the Times editorial on November 25, 1852. The State of Kentucky even went so far as to present to the Senate a formal petition praying for the acquisition of Cuba.

That the consummation of this national policy of the American people was inevitable has been the uniform opinion of political thinkers of foreign countries—even of Spain itself. Speaking of 1854, Rhodes, in his History of the United States, says: "The most sensible men of Spain were convinced that Cuba must sooner or later belong to the United States." In 1887, Froude, that keenest observer of all English historians, called America "the residuary legatee of all the West Indies."

Such was the current of American opinion and policy, and such was the view of the world, down to the moment when the Teller resolution was attached to the declaration of Congress demanding that Spain withdraw from Cuba. That resolution is as follows:

"That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people."

This resolution was reported to the Senate by the committee immediately before a vote was taken on the declaration to which it was attached, and was adopted as a part thereof without discussion.

If it means that the United States should utterly withdraw from Cuba, leaving that people, without aid, guidance, or restraint, to work their ruin and our injury, this resolution is destructive of the unanimous conclusion of American statesmanship and public opinion from before the foundation of our Government. It can not mean such withdrawal, therefore, since it is a rule of interpretation, familiar to courts, that no law must be construed as repealing all former laws on the same subject if it admits of a meaning in harmony with them. And it is not within rational belief that Congress intended such a sudden reversal of the unbroken line of expressions of American purpose on this subject.

If the Teller resolution means the unconditional abandonment of the Cuban people by the United States without having taken measures to secure a stable government, it was intended to prevent Cuban liberty and retard Cuban progress, for that such would be the result of such entire American desertion of Cuba I shall presently demonstrate. Such a meaning, therefore, can not be attributed to Congress, whose purpose in going to war with Spain was to aid and not to injure the Cuban people.

If this resolution means that we were to cast Cuba adrift, a derelict on our very coasts, it was intended to impair the interests, paralyze the Cuban commerce, and imperil the safety of the United States; for that such would be the result is known of all men. But a purpose so unpatriotic we dare not attribute to Congress, which, while inspired by an earnest friendship for every other people, owes its first and highest duty to the American people.

But if such be the meaning of this resolution, let us frankly admit that it was a mistake; and between the consummation of such a mistake with its ruinous consequences, on the one hand, and the frank and brave correction of it by the establishment and protection of liberty, order, right, and law, on the other hand, there is no choice. In individual morals and in national statesmanship the latter is the only course possible.

But does not a study of the whole subject give this resolution a different meaning? Must it not be read in the light of our entire history, of which it is a part? Must it not be interpreted by the geographical, industrial, social, and human conditions inherent in the situation? Such construction is natural, customary, essential. No act of American statesmanship stands alone. All that is enduring is the result of growth and outgrowth. Submitted to these usual and ordinary principles of interpretation, construed by these admitted standards of wisdom and justice, the Teller resolution does not deny, but demands, that the United States shall take measures to insure, on the one hand, the realities and not the mockery of liberty to the Cuban people and to insure, on the other hand, the welfare of the American people. Interpreted by these principles and measured by these standards, this resolution requires that the United States shall see to it that a stable Cuban government is established and maintained, and that the island is protected from all foreign interference or attack.

Is any other interpretation sane? Would not any court, construing the expression of the purpose of an individual, consider the whole case of which that expression is a part? And can this result in injury to Cuba? Who so concerned as the United States that Cuba shall have law, order, prosperity, and peace within and be secure from molestation from without? Who so interested as Cuba in the safety of the United States, upon whose markets, investments, and active friendship Cuba's welfare depends? The resolution can not be interpreted in hostility to the American people who made possible a Cuban government of any kind. And to construe it as requiring us to abandon the Cuban people to their fate is to do them irreparable wrong. Such construction would annul the resolution's very letter and defeat its expressed purpose. Considered even as an isolated statement, such construction is impossible; impossible, considered as a part of the unbroken current of American statesmanship; impossible, considered as a rule of procedure by which Congress was to solve the practical problem confronting it.

What was that problem? The facts define it.

Cuba was not able to expel Spain. Not all the Cuban people wanted Spain expelled. The United States ejected Spanish government from that island. In doing this, the United States expended many scores of millions of dollars. Our soldiers gladly gave their lives. And when the Spanish flag was hauled down and the American flag had taken its place, the Administration found property destroyed, roads few and poor, schoolhouses scanty and abandoned.

It found a postal service hardly superior to that of Spain a hundred years ago. It found an appalling illiteracy. It found cities without sanitation. It found poverty, starvation, demoralization, and all but anarchy. And yet these conditions were very little inferior to those which existed before the insurrection of the Cubans against Spanish authority. No more instructive study can be found than that of the sanitary situation reported in the American census of the island for 1899.

A separate article might be devoted to a statement of the vital statistics of Cuba. One or two facts may serve as a suggestive searchlight in passing. The population of the island is 1,572,797. Of this population, 1,108,709 are single, 246,357 are married, and 131,732 are living together by mutual consent. Of this population, 1,067,354 are whites and 505,443 are colored. Of the whites almost all are of Spanish descent.

Of these more than 1,000,000 whites, 50 per cent can neither read nor write; and of the more than half a million colored, more than 70 per cent can neither read nor write. This is the statement of our census, taken by Cuban collectors. A gentleman of unquestioned reliability, and of thorough personal familiarity with the Cuban people, informs me that at least 70 per cent of the whites and more than 90 per cent of the colored population can neither read nor write. And yet, under our military administration order has been restored and maintained, property and life protected, and sanitary revolution has been effected in Habana, Santiago, and the other considerable cities of the island. An excellent postal service has been established, and is now in operation in every province. Under the Spanish régime, at its best estate, scarcely 10,000 children were in school. At the time we took possession there were less than 4,000 children in school. The education was slothful, fragmentary, unscientific. To-day there are more than 150,000 Cuban children in school, and education is systematized and conducted on approved and modern principles.

And these items are only the landmarks of what has really been accomplished. All this, too, has been done by American authority in two year's time. It is a record of administrative capacity to which history shows no parallel. Of the remarkable achievements of the present Administration, not one is more brilliant than its conduct of affairs in the island of Cuba.

How best to preserve and continue this progress of Cuba; how, at the same time, to secure the safety and protect the interests of the United States; how to interpret the historic purpose of the American people, who had sacrificed so much treasure and blood for the Cuban people, and how to act so that the Teller resolution would not defeat itself and so that a steady government might exist in Cuba were the profound, complex, and most delicate questions which Congress was called upon to answer and which the Cuban Committee of the United States Senate, with ORVILLE H. PLATT, of Connecticut, at its head, answered so well in the Cuban amendment to the Army bill.

Let us consider this amendment:

That no foreign power shall establish any but trade relations with Cuba is necessary to both Cuba and the United States. It is intolerable that any foreign power shall obtain jurisdiction over an inch of Cuban soil. It is intolerable even to think of the government of Cuba giving to Germany or England or France or any other great power a naval station. And yet, without restriction, the Cuban government could give any foreign power rights amounting to that and keep within the Monroe doctrine. Think of the consequences! From Tortugas to Habana is only 90 miles, from Cuba to Yucatan is little more than 100 miles. A foreign squadron with naval rendezvous in Habana Harbor and a small patrol along the difficult Yucatan Passage could blockade the Gulf of Mexico, the Isthmian Canal, the Mississippi River, and absolutely cut off our immense foreign commerce from and to our Gulf and Mississippi River ports and our immeasurably greater coastwise trade much more completely than the same naval strength could blockade the harbor of New York. Accordingly, the Cuban amendment to the Army bill provides:

"That the government of Cuba shall never enter into any treaty or other compact with any foreign power or powers which will impair or tend to impair the independence of Cuba, nor in any manner authorize or permit any foreign power or powers to obtain by colonization or for military or naval purposes, or otherwise, lodgment in or control over any portion of said island."

But it is also necessary that the United States shall actually possess such naval stations along the Cuban coasts as may be necessary to our national defense and to the defense of Cuba. The Cuban people, numbering only a million and a half, unassisted by us, could not properly fortify or equip their harbors. Certainly they could not build a fleet necessary to the island's protection; and if they could, such a fleet, in certain contingencies apparent to all men, might be a menace to the American Government. But with the United States in possession of the necessary naval stations, the independence of the island and its people from every foreign power and every combination of foreign powers is assured, and the American Republic secured from attack in the Gulf, at the mouth of the Mississippi. Accordingly, the Cuban amendment to the Army bill provides:

"That to enable the United States to maintain the independence of Cuba and to protect the people thereof, as well as for its own defense, the government of Cuba will sell or lease to the United States lands necessary for coaling or naval stations at certain specified points, to be agreed upon with the President of the United States."

Even this is not broad enough for the protection of the Cuban people and of American interests and safety. A familiar method by which a power secures practical control of a desirable point inhabited by a weak people is to seize that people's ports in order to collect the revenues for payment of debt.

The first necessity of a new government is money. Its earliest condition is financial obligation. Without restriction and guidance by a friendly and experienced government whose interests are the interests of the Cuban people it was inevitable that the new and experimental government of the island would contract debts beyond the ability of the Cuban people to pay. This has been the experience of nearly all new governments. If such a debt were contracted in England or Germany or France, it was inevitable that upon default of payment either of those powers would seize the revenues of the island to indemnify their citizens against loss. And the United States could not prevent this unless the United States would guarantee such debt or go to war with the creditor power to prevent its just collection. Every one of these contingencies is inconsistent with American safety and interests, and even more inconsistent with the interests, liberty, and independence of the Cuban people. Therefore the Cuban amendment to the Army bill provides:

"That said government (Cuba) shall not assume or contract any public debt to pay the interest upon which, and to make reasonable sinking-fund provision for the ultimate discharge of which, the ordinary revenues of the island, after defraying the current expenses of government, shall be inadequate."

It will be helpful to recall that the debt Spain contracted for Cuba was $400,000,000; and this debt the Cuban amendment prevents Cuba from ever paying or being compelled to pay. The bonds issued by the revolutionary government in the insurrection preceding the last, and still held somewhere by some one, are supposed to reach into the hundreds of millions. The amount of bonds issued by the last insurrectionary government, held by persons in Cuba and the United States, is unknown; but I have heard it estimated at from $100,000 to $300,000,000. No accurate information can be had concerning the quantity of these bonds, or of the bonds of the former insurrectionary government. What part, if any, they play at present can only be surmised. It is doubtful if they affect the question; but they are useful as indicating the financial certainties of an unrestrained Cuban Government.

Even with all the above, the welfare of the Cuban people was still open to attack from another enemy and at their weakest point. That point was within, and that enemy themselves. The right of the United States to intervene for the maintenance of the realities of Cuban freedom is the measure of all measures most in the interests of the Cuban people. Would it have been wise and just to neglect this most important and immediate obligation of all? If it is our business to see that the Cubans are not destroyed by any foreign power, is it not our duty to see that they are not destroyed by themselves? It was a far-seeing benevolence which inspired Congress to provide that we may preserve the Cuban Government from the hands of warring factions, and protect the individual liberty, the property, and the rights of Cuban citizens. Congress actually bestowed upon Cuba the same guaranty of social order and governmental stability which our Constitution guarantees to every one of the States of the Union. This great provision of the Cuban amendment is as follows:

"That the Government of Cuba consents that the United States may exercise the right to intervene for the preservation of Cuban independence, the maintenance of a Government adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty, and for discharging the obligations with respect to Cuba imposed by the treaty of Paris on the United States, now to be assumed and undertaken by the Government of Cuba."

The sanitation of Cuba was the pressing problem which confronted the Administration upon our occupation of the island, and it is the immediate question which will confront the island's new government. In this vital business even the best-equipped Cubans are unschooled. And yet, upon proper sanitation depends the security of the Cuban people from pestilence. Upon it depends the safety of our own people from yellow fever. New Orleans, Mobile, Tampa, all our Southern ports, have time and again been infected, and the disease has spread northward even to the Ohio. It is a subject which admitted and admits of no trifling. It is a business to be dealt with practically and on the instant. To enthrone a plague in a permanent home at the very gates of the Republic would have been an act which a volume of resolutions, no matter how interpreted, never could have excused. And Congress never wrought more wisely than when it provided in the Cuban amendment:

"That the Government of Cuba will execute, and as far as necessary extend, the plans already devised, or other plans to be mutually agreed upon, for the sanitation of the cities of the island, to the end that a recurrence of epidemic and infectious diseases may be prevented, thereby assuring protection to the people and commerce of Cuba, as well as to the commerce of the Southern ports of the United States and the people residing therein."

That the sinister situations, which the Cuban amendment are designed to prevent, would have been the results of a Cuban Government unaided by the United States, is not an open question. Were no examples at hand, the character and history of the Cuban population itself proves this. But examples are at hand, and the men to whom the American people have intrusted their interests, and those of the Cuban people also, had to consider them.

These examples are the Central and South American Republics. Review them, taking the most advantageously situated first.

The Argentine Republic has the best climate, the most fertile soil, and the richest resources of any portion of South America, and, with perhaps two exceptions, of the entire surface of the earth. It has a larger percentage of solid, self-governing people of Europe than any other South American State. But its history bristles with revolt. There have been two revolutions within the last ten years. The killing and wounding of two or three thousand people in a political riot has occurred more than once. Schemes of financial idealists have been put into reckless practice. And yet the paper constitution of this Republic is admirable, its schools numerous, and its system of education, in theory, excellent.

To the north of the Argentine Republic lies Brazil. It became a republic in 1890 by bloodless revolution. In one year another revolution placed Peixoto in the President's chair, and in less than two years more another revolution, with the army supporting one side and the navy the other, continued until Admiral Benham, in command of the war ships of the United States, threatened to fire on the insurgent navy in the harbor of Rio de Janeiro, thus ending the revolt. To the north of Brazil is Venezuela. From 1821, when independence was established, until 1870 Venezuela was in a state of almost continuous convulsion. And although peace has been more assured since that time conditions have been anything but settled.

Of Colombia, from which Venezuela seceded after Bolivar had wrested independence from Spain, Hamblen Sears declares: "Its history to the present day has been one of the sudden rise of one or another of the popular leaders and his sudden fall." This, too, is largely true of Costa Rica, although the government of that State has been and is more stable than that of most Spanish-American republics.

Guatemala has been the red field of revolution and the hotbed of impracticable dreams. Of Honduras, Mr. Sears declares that, "like the other Central American republics, Honduras has been full of bloodshed and internal war." And he says that "Nicaragua, since 1860, has been most of the time in a state of war, interrupted with a change of Presidents and numerous pronunciamentos." The history of Peru is the narrative of the rise and fall of dictators. Those who think that the ability of the Cuban people to frame a paper constitution with rapidity is an evidence of capacity for self-government should remember that Peru surpasses Cuba as a rapid constitution maker, having produced three separate constitutions in little more than ten years—one in 1828, one in 1833, and still another in 1839. And Mr. Sears despairingly writes: "The Salvadorian constitution has been so often changed that it is impossible to follow it." Until recent years Chile has been in a state of recurrent revolution and violence.

The condition of public order was illustrated by the attack upon the peaceful seamen of the American ship Baltimore, still fresh in the memory of all. Not a single Spanish-American republic brightens this melancholy chronicle. Paraguay has been the scene of so much strife that its male population was at one time almost extinct. And Uruguay has been called the "Battlefield of the La Plata." All these countries show a languid progress toward settled conduct and self-restraint; but every forward step has been made at terrible cost, a cost which the aid and instruction of a friendly and experienced government might have saved to each while accelerating that progress incalculably.

It must be repeated and again repeated that the paper constitutions of these countries have been fine examples of government by manuscript. This clarifying fact must not be forgotten by those who think that government by manuscript is equivalent to government by practice.

These political phenomena, common to all Spanish-American republics, whether in the tropic, semitropic, or temperate zone, unvaried by climate or character of soil, and occurring in spite of excellent paper constitutions, are object lessons which Congress dared not disregard. The character of the people of these republics is similar to that of the people of Cuba. Their racial origin is the same. Their history has been the same. Their tutelage under Spanish misrule has been the same. If there is any element of difference, that element is the greater proportion of blacks in Cuba. But history and contemporaneous fact do not justify the belief that this element, left to itself, increases the Cuban capacity for self-government, unaided, unguided, and unrestrained.

Haiti, directly across from Cuba, is an instance. When under the rule of the French all writers agree that, in spite of the drawback of slavery, Haiti was a prosperous colony. But from the time French power was overthrown its condition has been serious. A late writer says that "the atrocious administration of the Government all through the Haitian history of this century has been unequaled in the world." On the contrary, British Guiana and British Honduras, with government administered by those who have a capacity for administration, have enjoyed a steadiness of order and a respect for law unequaled elsewhere in South or Central America; and New Mexico, with a population racially similar to those of Spanish America, has, under our administration, given us no trouble.

In dealing with Cuba, Congress could not ignore all this. Congress was compelled to consider the character and inexperience of Cuba's population; the history of the attempts of similar populations to govern themselves; the present condition of such experimental governments on the one hand, and the situation of the same populations, guided and restrained by the protection of an administrative people, on the other hand. Congress had to consider, too, the facts of the last two years—the expulsion of Spain from Cuba by American arms; the occupation of the island by American authority, law, and order; the feeding of starving Cuban thousands with American bread; the establishment of Cuban schools, posts, and sanitation upon modern methods by American administrators; the Amer'can purification of the Cuban customs service; the impartial American administration of Cuban justice; the protection of Cuban life and property by an American and Americanized police; the beginning of the development of the richest agricultural, mineral, and timber resources on the face of the globe, under the faith of American protection; in a word, the American foundation in Cuba of civilization and of that liberty regulated by law which is the end and purpose of all free government.

Congress had to consider, too, the American people. The sacrifices of the American people in blood and treasure and administration deserved such consideration. The geographical position of Cuba demanded it. The historian of a century hence would have properly denounced any action on the part of the American Congress which, by any possibility, might result in delivering this gateway to the American Mediterranean, to any and all isthmian canals, to the mouth of that great artery of American commerce, the Mississippi River, to our whole Gulf seaboard of 3,551 miles, over into the hands of those who, by treaty or purchase or any circumstances of peace or war, might possibly become our national foes.

Thus it appears that our Cuban legislation deprives Cuba of nothing that can help her, but bestows every benefit and erects every safeguard necessary to her settled and orderly self-government. It insures the development of the island's resources and the highest happiness possible to its people. Against the enemies of Cuba, foreign and domestic, is drawn the sword of the great Republic; and under its protection the infant state may grow in peace and wax strong in a sure security. It is an inspiring scene with which the young century begins—the newest government of the world aided, guided, and protected by the freest.

We are not depriving Cuba of liberty; we are helping her to liberty. Landowners are not to be robbed; they are to be protected. Cities are not to be sacked; they are to be defended. Equal rights are not to be violated; they are to be preserved and enforced. Free speech is not to be suppressed; it is to be fostered. Education is not to be destroyed; it is to be built up. But anarchy is to be kept down, foreign powers kept at bay, and the elements that oppose Cuban progress held in check. All this is not the denial of liberty; it is the bestowal of liberty; for liberty can not live without order and law.

The Cuban people and the American people are not and are not to be enemies or strangers. We are and are still more to be friends, "close friends," to use the President's felicitous phrase. We are not yet united into a single nation as the fathers hoped we should be; and such a union may never occur; but, while establishing Cuba's independent governmental identity, the United States has given her our permanent counsel, aid, and comfort.

Whether that relation shall develop into a still closer connection depends upon the Cuban people. It is a question which time alone can adequately answer. No wisdom equals the wisdom of events. And the Cuban legislation of Congress permits the wisdom of events to work out its results in its own time. Meanwhile the relation established by that legislation is admirable, considered from the view point of the present; and it may prove the permanent solution of this hitherto vexed and vexing problem. But whether this is the final development, or whether it is an epoch in an historical evolution, growing ever happier as it proceeds, the welfare of the Cuban people and the safety of the American people are secure.

ALBERT J. BEVERIDGE.

ABANDONED MILITARY RESERVATIONS IN WYOMING.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Illinois withhold the motion until I can call up a bill which is on the Presiding Officer's desk?

Mr. CULLOM. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the action of the House on Senate bill 3908.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3908) granting homesteaders on the abandoned Fort Bridger, Fort Sanders, and Fort Laramie military reservations, in Wyoming, the right to purchase one quarter section of public land on said reservations as pasture or grazing lands, which were, on page 1, line 3, to strike out "exercised" and insert "or may hereafter exercise;" on page 1, line 6, before "in," to insert "or the abandoned Fort Laramie Wood Reservation, to which the homestead laws are hereby extended;" on page 1, line 6, to strike out "now;" on page 1, line 8, after "is," to insert "a resident and;" and to amend the title so as to read:

A bill granting homesteaders on the abandoned Fort Bridger, Fort Sanders, and Fort Laramie military reservations, and Fort Laramie Wood Reservation, in Wyoming, the right to purchase one quarter section of public land on said reservations as pasture or grazing land, and for other purposes.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to ask the Senator from Wyoming to explain the amendments.

Mr. WARREN. The main amendment includes the Fort Laramie wood reservation with the other reservations mentioned. That is the only amendment, except a change of language.

Mr. SPOONER. Is the inclusion of this reservation recommended by the Interior Department?

Mr. WARREN. I so understand from the House. If there is any question about it I will withdraw the motion to concur.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know anything about it. The Senator from Iowa may.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not. That is the reason why I inquired of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. CULLOM. I hope the matter may go over.

Mr. WARREN. I do not object to that. It is a matter which relates to Wyoming.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent the vote will be reconsidered, and the question will be regarded as open.

Mr. WARREN subsequently said: The objection to the concurrence in the House amendments to Senate bill 3908 has been withdrawn, and I therefore move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

Mr. CULLOM. I will withdraw the motion for an executive session if the Senator from Wyoming is certain he will get the bill through.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair again lays before the Senate the bill referred to. The question is on concurring in the amendments of the House of Representatives.

The amendments were concurred in.

CATHARINE F. EDMUNDS.

Mr. GALLINGER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1172) granting an increase of pension to Catharine F. Edmunds, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendment.

J. H. GALLINGER,
J. R. BURTON,
PARIS GIBSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
J. H. BROMWELL,
WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 45 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 23, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 22, 1902.

PROMOTIONS IN THE NAVY.

Asst. Surg. Holton C. Curl, to be a passed assistant surgeon in the Navy, from the 14th day of October, 1901, to fill a vacancy existing in that grade.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 22, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

The following prayer was offered by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.:

Our Father, who art in heaven, we thank Thee for that inherent love of liberty which from time immemorial has inspired men to deeds of heroism and glory, and which gave to our fathers the spirit of 1776, which added a new nation to the world, a government of the people, by the people, for the people, and that under its benign influence and guiding hand a new republic has just been born in the Western Hemisphere. God grant that the people of Cuba may appreciate the right to think for themselves, to act for themselves, and enjoy the fruit of their own labors; that they may use, but never abuse, those precious privileges; that they may grow intellectually, morally, and spiritually, and become an added instrument in Thy hands for the spread of Thy Kingdom upon the earth. In the name of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

THOMAS WELLS.

Mr. RIXEY. Mr. Speaker, since the passage of House bill 12576, to increase the pension of Thomas Wells, the beneficiary has died. Therefore there seems to be no necessity for this bill going to the President, and I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the House has been informed that since the passage of the bill (H. R. 12576) granting an increase of pension to Thomas Wells the said Thomas Wells has died: Therefore,

Resolved, That the said bill (H. R. 12576) be transmitted to the Senate with the request that it reconsider the vote whereby it passed the said bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question was taken and the resolution was agreed to.

USE AND IMPROVEMENT OF GOVERNORS ISLAND, BOSTON HARBOR.

The SPEAKER laid before the House House joint resolution 113, authorizing the use and improvement of Governors Island, Boston Harbor, with a Senate amendment, which was read.

Mr. CONRY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM D. TANNER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 6360) granting an increase of pension to William D. Tanner, with a Senate amendment, which was read.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

MATILDA E. CLARKE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 12418) granting a pension to Matilda E. Clarke, with Senate amendments, which were read.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

CATHERINE F. EDMUNDS.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report, and I ask that the reading of the report be dispensed with and that the statement be read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New Jersey asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the report and that the statement be read. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The report of the committee of conference is as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 1172) "An act granting an increase of pension to Catherine F. Edmunds," having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its amendments.

H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
J. H. BROMWELL,
WILLIAM RICHARDSON,
Managers on the part of the House.
J. H. GALLINGER,
J. R. BURTON,
PARIS GIBSON,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement of the conferees was read, as follows:

This bill originally passed the Senate at $35 per month, but was amended in the House to $30 per month. The result of the conference is that the House recedes from its amendment, and your conferees recommend that the bill pass at $35 a month, as it originally passed the Senate.

H. C. LOUDENSLAGER,
J. H. BROMWELL,
WILLIAM RICHARDSON.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the immigration bill; and, pending that motion, I desire to state that I have agreed with my colleague on the other side that general debate should cease at this time. I now ask unanimous consent to confirm our agreement.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12199, being the immigration bill; and pending that motion asks unanimous consent that general debate be now closed. Is there objection to the request? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. BOUTELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 12199. General debate having been closed, the Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill by paragraphs.

The Clerk read as follows:

That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of $1.50 cents for each and every passenger not a citizen of the United States, or of the Dominion of Canada, or of the Republic of Mexico, who shall come by steam, sail, or other vessel from any foreign port to any port within the United States. The said duty shall be paid to the collector of customs of the port or customs district to which said alien passenger shall come, or, if there be no collector at such port or district, then to the collector nearest thereto, by the master, agent, owner, or consignee of every such vessel, or by the alien passenger, if such alien passenger comes overland, within twenty-four hours after the arrival of such vessel in port, or by such overland alien passenger upon application for admission.

The money thus collected shall be paid into the United States Treasury and shall constitute a permanent appropriation to be called the "immigrant fund," to be used under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury to defray the expense of regulating the immigration of aliens into the United States under this act, including the cost of reports of decisions of the Federal courts, and digests thereof, for the use of the Commissioner-General of Immigration, and the salaries and expenses of all officers, clerks, and employees appointed for the purpose of enforcing the provisions of this act. The duty imposed by this section shall be a lien upon the vessel which shall bring such aliens to ports of the United States, and shall be a debt in favor of the United States against the owner or owners of such vessels, and the payment of such duty may be enforced by any legal or equitable remedy; and if any such alien seeking admission overland refuses or neglects to pay such duty as hereinbefore provided he shall be refused admission to the United States, and if found subsequently to have obtained admission thereto after such neglect or refusal, he shall be deemed and adjudged to be unlawfully therein and may be deported, as is provided hereinafter for the deportation of other aliens found unlawfully in the United States: Provided, That the Commissioner-General of Immigration, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, by agreement with foreign transportation lines, as provided in section 33 of this act, may arrange in some other manner for the payment of the duty imposed by this section upon aliens seeking admission overland, either as to all or as to any such aliens.

The amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In line 25, page 2, after the word "immigration," insert the words "under the direction of."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. PAYNE having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13895) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 593) for the establishment, control, operation, and maintenance of the Northern Branch of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Hot Springs, in the State of South Dakota.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

Senate concurrent resolution 43.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Committee on Enrolled Bills, in the enrollment of the bill (S. 593) for the establishment, control, operation, and maintenance of a national sanitarium of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Hot Springs, in the State of South Dakota, are hereby authorized to strike out the words "Branch Home" from line 12, page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the word "sanitarium."

IMMIGRATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. SHATTUC. I send up the amendments of the committee.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I desire to be recognized after it is offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. PERKINS. What is the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The committee amendment has already been read by the Clerk, but without objection the Clerk will again report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 25, after the word "immigration," insert the words "under the direction of."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the Committee amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to have some explanation why this should be done.

Mr. SHATTUC. The amendments are to section 1, page 1, line 8; insert after the word "States" a comma instead of a period. And after the same word insert the following: "Or by any railroad or any other transportation." It is suggested that by using the word transportation we might include all means of transportation, including steamboat, railroad, or omnibus, or whatever kind of transportation used. Then in line 12, section 1, after the word "vessel," strike out the words "or by the alien passenger if such alien passenger comes overland, within twenty-four hours after the arrival of such vessel in port or by such overland alien passenger upon application for admission" and insert in lieu thereof the words "or transportation lines." This is done at the request of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Then, on line 25, page 2, after the word "immigration," insert the words "under the direction or;" that is to take the initiative away from the Commissioner-General and leave it with the Secretary of the Treasury as it is now.

Mr. PERKINS. Are those all the amendments offered?

Mr. SHATTUC. That is all that has been offered up to this time.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard for a moment, to ask the chairman of the committee a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SHATTUC. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to ask in reference to one question which I could not understand in the bill as it is printed. I presume it will be explained by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. SHATTUC. Does it pertain to this question?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. SHATTUC. What is it?

Mr. PERKINS. The bill as it reads says:

There shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of $1.50 for each and every passenger.

That first section as it reads would impose a tax of $1.50 on each and every passenger that comes to this country, whether he comes here to reside or whether he comes here for the purpose of business only. I have looked through the act to see if there was not some explanation by which this section should be modified so that it would only impose the tax upon those persons who are aliens coming here to reside, and not upon anyone who came here simply for the purpose of business. I have not found it in the act, but I am not as familiar with the act as my friend from Ohio, and I ask him where is the provision?

Mr. SHATTUC. What provision?

Mr. PERKINS. Which says that the tax is to be levied only on aliens coming here to reside.

Mr. SHATTUC. If the gentleman will read the bill which he has in his hand he will see that it excepts American citizens, citizens of the United States, of the Dominion of Canada, and of the Republic of Mexico.

Mr. PERKINS. But suppose the man comes from England?

Mr. SHATTUC. Then he would pay a dollar and a half tax.

Mr. PERKINS. The intention is to tax every man who comes from England on business, every traveling agent, every member of an embassy, or a tourist from England, and to say that he shall pay a dollar and a half to get into the United States?

Mr. SHATTUC. The passengers do not pay it; the steamship companies pay it.

Mr. PERKINS. Is that the law now?

Mr. SHATTUC. That is the effect of it. I presume it has been so for twenty-five years.

Mr. PERKINS. And the tax is collected on every traveler?

Mr. SHATTUC. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. A dollar and a half a head?

Mr. SHATTUC. Not a dollar and a half, but a dollar. If the gentleman will look at the type in which the language is printed, he will see that it is the old law.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not care what type it is printed in; I want to know what these provisions are.

Mr. SHATTUC. If I have my way, the law will be that every passenger pays, or the company pays, a dollar and a half on every passenger that comes to the country, except citizens of the United States, citizens of the Republic of Mexico, and of Canada. For all others that come here we will collect from the company one dollar and a half apiece.

Mr. PERKINS. That would apply to everyone that comes here by railroad?

Mr. SHAUTUC. It is so now.

Mr. PERKINS. The railroads pay a dollar and a half a head?

Mr. SHATTUC. The railroad company.

Mr. PERKINS. Is there any other civilized country outside of China that levies a tax of this sort upon people coming into the country?

Mr. SHATTUC. Yes; $5 a head.

Mr. PERKINS. What country?

Mr. SHATTUC. Australia.

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, very likely.

Mr. HILL. May I ask the gentleman a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Connecticut?

Mr. SHATTUC. Yes.

Mr. HILL. Do I understand that a person coming from England to spend a week in the United States for business purposes or for pleasure that a tax is laid of a dollar and a half for coming into the country?

Mr. SHATTUC. Yes; but the steamship company pays it.

Mr. HILL. They pay a penalty for coming into the country?

Mr. SHATTUC. No. They pay their share of the police expenses, expenses attending inspection, and other expenses attending it.

Mr. HILL. Is it not about time we stopped it?

Mr. SHATTUC. No; I think not.

Mr. RAY of New York. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHATTUC. Well.

Mr. RAY of New York. Do you say that if a man comes in here by railroad he pays a tax?

Mr. SHATTUC. I have answered that ten times, and it seems to me that a great constitutional lawyer like the gentleman from New York should not ask the question again.

Mr. RAY of New York. Will the gentleman kindly answer my question? I do not see it.

Mr. SHATTUC. The gentleman does not see what?

Mr. RAY of New York. It says every passenger who shall come by steam, sail, or other vessel from any foreign port to a port in the United States.

Mr. SHATTUC. That refers particularly to vessels.

Mr. RAY of New York. The bill does not say so.

Mr. SHATTUC. That is in the middle of the bill. The gentleman will find it if he reads the bill through. Mr. Chairman, I ask a vote on the amendment.

Mr. KLUTTZ. I see that this proposition exempts persons from the Dominion of Canada and the Republic of Mexico. I do not know from whence, except from those two places, anybody could come into the country by rail.

Mr. SHATTUC. The persons coming in pay this tax without knowing it, because it is paid by the steamship companies, who charge it over to the passenger.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. I should like to ask a question. Suppose an Englishman, residing at some city on the other side of Lake Ontario, comes to the city of Rochester, where I reside. The fare on the steamer is $1; but coming from Toronto, he would under this bill, as I understand, be obliged to pay an additional $1.50, though his only purpose in coming to Rochester may be to buy something from Rochester merchants. In other words, if this proposed law should be enforced—I do not know that it will be—it is going to cost a man who is not born in Canada $1.50 in addition to the $1 fare in order to come to Rochester and do business. This is my understanding of the bill, and I would like to know whether it is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CANNON. I should like to hear the amendment read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "immigration," in line 25, page 2, insert "under the direction or."

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is not the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment just read is an amendment proposed by the committee. The Chair will state that a good deal of the discussion has apparently been directed to a series of amendments which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] has sent to the Clerk's desk, but which have not yet been reported. The question is now on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] presents a series of amendments, the first of which will now be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1, page 1, line 8, by inserting after "United States," a comma instead of a period, and then inserting after the word "States" the following: "Or by any railway or by any other mode of transportation from foreign contiguous territory to the United States."

Mr. McCALL. I should like to ask the gentleman who proposes this amendment whether it is necessary for a person coming into this country by rail, if he is not a citizen of Mexico or Canada, to pay $1.50 under the existing law?

Mr. SHATTUC. A citizen of Canada will not have to pay it.

Mr. McCALL. Then, would not the effect of the amendment which the gentleman proposes be to require the payment of that tax in order to come into this country by railroad?

Mr. SHATTUC. Not at all.

Mr. McCALL. Then I did not understand the amendment as it was read.

Mr. SHATTUC. I have stated distinctly that citizens of the Dominion of Canada, citizens of Mexico, and citizens of the United States are to be exempt.

Mr. McCALL. But, as I understand, anyone else than a citizen of Canada or of Mexico or the United States coming to this country by rail would, under the operation of the gentleman's amendment, have to pay $1.50 tax, and that is not the existing law.

Mr. SHATTUC. I said that $1.50 was not the existing law; they pay $1 now. We increase the tax by adding 50 cents. The old law provides a tax of $1.

Mr. McCALL. I may have a wrong copy of the bill; but as I understand, the bill now before the House provides simply for this tax upon those who come by steam, sail, or other vessel; and the gentleman from Ohio proposes as an amendment to add those who come in by any transportation line.

Mr. SHATTUC. That is the law now.

Mr. McCALL. That is what I would like to have explained, because I do not see in the present law (which is printed in Roman type in connection with this bill) the provision to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. SHATTUC. An amendment will be offered correcting that—inserting in lieu thereof "or transportation lines," which will include railroad lines. That part of the bill is not very plain and will be corrected.

A MEMBER. How is the tax collected?

Mr. SHATTUC. The tax is collected by agreement of the Canadian lines, and they pay the tax themselves.

Mr. McCALL. Is there anything in the existing law including transportation lines in that general way?

Mr. SHATTUC. There is nothing that specifically provides who shall collect the tax on the Canadian lines. It is made permissive with the Canadian lines to make an arrangement with our Government officials, and they have been making such an arrangement for twenty years.

Mr. McCALL. Is that by law or by agreement?

Mr. SHATTUC. By law they are authorized to make the arrangement. In another part of this bill it is provided that this may be done.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Mr. Chairman, there are some things about this amendment that I want to be heard upon. Under the existing law of to-day, if a man not a citizen of Canada, if I may use that term, or subject of Canada, living in Canada, crosses over into the State of Maine to do any trading or visiting, he does not pay a dollar and a half every time he or any of his family come across the line. I live in a town right opposite the city of Woodstock, where we interchange visits frequently, and parties cross the line between the two countries for trade purposes every day. Nobody ever thinks of collecting a dollar and a half for the visitors or persons coming over to trade or for any other temporary purpose.

Mr. SHATTUC. Does the gentleman know why not?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. There is no law authorizing it.

Mr. SHATTUC. We do not make them pay here in this country, because they would retaliate at once and make our people pay over there.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. This amendment would make it imperative upon them to pay a dollar and a half if they were not citizens of Canada, as the bill calls the subjects of Great Britain living in Canada.

Mr. SHATTUC. Not at all.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Then I can not understand the meaning of the English language.

Mr. SHATTUC. Then the gentleman can not understand the English language. He ought to. It is very plain there that the citizens of Canada are exempt from the operation of the law.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. The term "citizen of Canada" is used. I was not aware that there is any such term as "citizen of Canada." If you will change that to "resident of Canada"——

Mr. SHATTUC. It is subjects of the Dominion.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. They are subjects of Great Britain and residents of Canada. If the gentleman will change that to "residents of Canada," excepting all persons residing in Canada, then I think the bill may not be subject to so much objection as it now is.

Mr. SHATTUC. I will say to the gentleman that long before he and I became statesmen this was the law as it is now.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I think not. There is no such law that I ever had my attention called to, and I have been a collector of customs along the frontier for some years, and had something to do with these matters.

Mr. SHATTUC. The gentleman means about the citizens of the United States and those of the Dominion of Canada. That is the law now.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I believe that if you were to apply this to persons who crossed our border as they do up in the vicinity of the home of my friend from New York [Mr. PERKINS], and as they are doing in my own place, that instead of having it read "citizens of Canada," for there really is nothing of that kind, it should read "residents of Canada."

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Offer that amendment.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I will, perhaps, when the time comes——

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Now is the time.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. After this amendment has been adopted I may offer an amendment to change the word "citizen," in line 5, to "resident."

Mr. LESSLER. Offer it now! Offer it now!

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, the adoption of this amendment would destroy the restrictive character of this bill. All a man would have to do would be to move into Canada, where he becomes a resident, not a citizen, and then he would be free to cross the border into the United States, and the whole scope and object of this bill would be nullified. The term "resident" would impose no length of residence in order to establish it as the term "citizen" might under the laws of the country, and it would simply open the doors to the migration into this country which we are now trying to restrict and nullify the object of this bill, and especially the new features which have been engrafted on it at the request and demand of the laboring classes of the country. You might as well not pass this bill as to say that every resident of Canada—not a citizen, but a resident—can cross the boundary lines of the United States and come in. Why, all migrations from Europe would come to Canada and become residents and then cross the border.

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman think anybody would become a resident of Canada to save a dollar and a half. [Laughter.]

Mr. ADAMS. They would become a resident of Canada for one day——

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts. That would cost a dollar and a half, would it not?

Mr. ADAMS. The gentleman thinks the steamship tax of a dollar and a half is of no importance. I will state that it is of such importance that it is diverting the passenger traffic to the Dominion lines of Canada, and the matter that interests the gentlemen from New England so much is the transportation on their railways down into the interior of the country. It is of sufficient importance to do that. A man will remain a resident of Canada for one day, come in in that way and escape the tax, and it will nullify entirely the purposes of this bill, which are to stop the migrations through the open doors of Canada, which is one of the great evils of which the Treasury Department now complains.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Mr. Chairman, I do not raise the objection for any such purpose as is indicated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS]. I raise the objection for the reason that I believe it will prevent persons from coming across the border for trading or visiting or anything of that kind, whether it be up on the northern border of New York or on the border of Maine. And at the proper time I purpose to offer an amendment to strike out the word "citizen," in line 5, and insert instead thereof the words "subjects of Great Britain, bona fide residents of Canada."

Mr. ADAMS. What is a bona fide resident?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. One who has his home honestly there; not one who has gone there, as the gentleman seems to think they would, to escape the payment of a dollar and a half and expend $25 in doing it.

Mr. ADAMS. Oh, no.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman, who is on the Committee on Foreign Affairs, as well as the Immigration Committee, and knows much more than I do about matters of this kind, what do we understand by citizens of Canada? Is there any such class of persons? I live on the border, and I never heard of them. I have heard of subjects of Great Britain residing in Canada and I have heard of Canadians.

Mr. ADAMS. I will say in reply to the gentleman that this very House has put that term into the Porto Rican bill and declared the inhabitants of the island of Porto Rico to be citizens of Porto Rico.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. That is an entirely different case.

Mr. ADAMS. So we have that distinction, which has been made by the House of Representatives. I will say to the gentleman, so far as the question of international law is concerned, that the term "citizen" is well understood to be a man who owes allegiance to a country and is subservient to its laws. The term "resident" has no such significance.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. RUCKER. The language of this bill complained of by the gentleman from Maine is existing law and has been in the immigration laws of the United States since 1882 at least. I have a copy of it here.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Does it apply to railroads?

Mr. RUCKER. It applies to the class of people in Canada that this bill applies to.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Will you please answer the question? Does the existing law apply to persons coming over the frontier on railroads?

Mr. RUCKER. It says:

That there shall be levied a duty of 50 cents for each and every passenger not a citizen of the United States who shall come—

I see it says—

by steam or sailing vessels.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I thought so. They cross back and forth—hundreds of them every day—on the railroad, to and from my town.

Mr. MCCALL. As there seems to be a question here as to what the existing law is, I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] that he permit this amendment to be temporarily passed over, in order that we may find out just what the existing law upon this point is. Of course if it is existing law I should be inclined to vote to reenact it; but if it is not existing law, then I think the committee should consider it more carefully.

Mr. PERKINS. It is not existing law.

Mr. MCCALL. If it is not existing law, the committee has not been correctly informed.

Mr. ADAMS. I will say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MCCALL] that this provision has been put in the bill in order to cure the great evil that now exists, the coming in through the door of Canada of persons whom we desire to keep out. Unless I am very much mistaken it is a new provision of law, and it is put in for the very purpose which this bill is trying to accomplish, which the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] will almost utterly destroy.

The information which comes to us from the Treasury Department to-day is that the law is being evaded through the transportation facilities by way of Canada. So great is this evil that recently the Treasury Department has sent additional inspectors to the various points of transportation on the Canadian frontier to stop it. The laws to-day are being almost nullified by the abuse of the open door through Canada, and the attention of the committee having been called to this fact, this provision was put on the bill both at the request of the Treasury Department and of the labor organizations of the country, to remedy this evil. I do not wish to repeat, but it is a very important matter; and if the amendment of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] is engrafted upon this bill and residents of Canada are allowed to come in, it would defeat the purpose of the bill, which is to try to remedy this ingress through the ports of Canada into our country.

Mr. MCCALL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] admits now that the provision embodied in this amendment is not a part of the existing law. It seems to me that it should not become a part of the existing law. It is an absurdity on the face of it that any person desiring to come into this country from abroad would come around by way of Canada and stop there in order to acquire a legal residence for the sake of saving a dollar and a half.

Now, if the gentleman can draw up an amendment so that people who come here from abroad—I mean from across the seas—by way of Canada shall pay $1.50, there can be no objection. But in New England we have very intimate trade relations with Canada. We have a great border commerce, and people are crossing back and forth constantly, and we do not care to have the annoyance of citizenship being inquired into and this special tax levied on passengers who are traveling, for instance, from Chicago to Boston by way of Canada or in returning to Boston also by way of Canada. It seems to me an unreasonable provision to put in this bill, that people coming to and from Canada upon business or for only a temporary purpose, should be required to pay this tax of $1.50. I hope that this provision will not be embodied in the law.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that this particular phraseology is the happiest that might be inserted in this bill, but something ought to be done, in my judgment, for the restriction of immigration. Almost every proposition that we have had that would have been restrictive has been defeated in this House by the local interests of gentleman who do not want to interfere with the trade of their particular towns. [Applause.] Now, I think that the word "passenger" is the better word. I think it will tend to keep out these people who are coming now through Canada. A gentleman near me just now told me that one Canadian steamship line has advertised that immigrants who can not get through at the port of New York can through Montreal, and it is because we have not this real restrictive provision that ought to be in the law.

Again, Mr. Chairman, there is a large number, a very large number, of people who come here every spring from the Mediterranean ports. They come in February and March. They work during the summer season, and in the fall they go back by the thousands. I think that those people ought to be kept out. If you try to do it by the use of the word "immigrants," they say they are not immigrants; they are "tourists;" they are "visitors;" it is not their intention to reside here, and hence the steamship company will not pay this fee. I want something done that will be restrictive of this immense immigration.

I received in my mail yesterday a communication that I suppose contains a statement of facts. Among others is a comparison for January, February, March, and April of 1900 and 1901 and 1902 of the immigrants coming into this country. In the four months of the first year 149,000 came, in the second year 154,000, and thus far this year—I am speaking of the four months this year—230,000 have already come.

If that ratio is kept up, 700,000 of these people will come here during this year. Now nearly half of them are laborers—men and women. They are adults. We are giving to these people a participation to that extent in our labor field. Mind you, they are not the class of immigrants that we used to have. Years ago, when the immigration was large, it came from Great Britain, from Germany, and from the northern States of Europe; all welcome here, making good citizens; but now the immigration in a large degree is coming from the eastern borders of Europe and from the south, and in very many instances—in the majority of instances—they are not desirable additions to our population. Five years from now under a lax administration of the naturalization laws these people would be voters. I do not want the voting power of the United States diluted in that way. I want to see everything that is restrictive in this bill retained in it, and would be glad if much could be added to it. I would rather double that tax than to add simply the 50 cents that this bill proposes to the present law.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I agree with every word that has been said by the gentleman from Iowa, and I go a great deal further. I think the immigration question is the most serious question before this country; but I believe that this tax of $1.50 will not keep one single immigrant out of the United States of America. I do believe that this tax of $1.50 on persons coming from Toronto to Rochester is a mere incumbrance of trade, and at the same time it will not keep out one immigrant, desirable or undesirable. Let this committee do what they should do, if they want to check immigration, and have some means by which they can do so without requiring a tax of $1.50. What does that amount to in the way of keeping an undesirable immigrant from coming in? To prevent this undesirable class of immigrants coming in you must provide some other means than this tax. I say that this provision of a $1.50 tax on every passenger will not stop a single one from coming in.

You simply have a provision which, if enforced, may be annoying, and interfere with legitimate trade between Canada and the United States, and will no more stop the tide of immigration than it will stop the tide of the Atlantic Ocean. So do not let my friend divert us from the question, which is a proper question to be decided here. Let him bring in an amendment by which immigrants will be turned back, and I will join with him, but when it comes to a mere annoying trade provision which, if enforced, will create incalculable annoyance to business and will not stop one immigrant coming in here, I see no reason for it. There is no reason for foolish legislation because we can not get wise legislation.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does the gentleman not know that the great difficulty is in distinguishing, in the hurry of this investigation, between the passenger and the immigrant? You can not distinguish, you can not get the evidence to show that a man is an immigrant if he, who knows all about it and is a stranger, asserts that he is here for a temporary purpose—that he is going back. The only way you can make it exclusive is to recognize him in the character that you know he is; you know he is a passenger and you can not know that he is an immigrant. His friends are with him and they can all join in the same statement that he is coming here for a temporary purpose. There is no possible way of overcoming that without you keep tab on these men during a period of five years, and that is utterly impossible. So that if you change that word, in my judgment you take the substance out of this bill.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. PERKINS. I want to answer the gentleman from Iowa first. But first, I would like to ask him a question. Does the gentleman from Iowa think that any man who desires to be an immigrant and come into this country to live will be turned back because he is required to pay 12 shillings for the privilege?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know, but I know that many and many a family coming here have expended everything they had to get here.

Mr. PERKINS. Quite right.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think if there was an additional cost put upon their passage perhaps they would not come, and it is in the hope that they would not, that is, the class I have heretofore spoken of from eastern and southern Europe, that I favor this provision. I hope that they will not come, and it is because of that that I want this as one of the restrictions. It is not sufficient in itself, but it is one restriction, however, and I would multiply them to keep them out if I could.

Mr. ADAMS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to answer the question of the gentleman from Iowa. One at a time is sufficient.

Mr. ADAMS. It is a hard question.

Mr. PERKINS. It is a hard question. If the gentleman from Iowa will join in voting to impose an educational test, he will find it will stop many more than a tax of 12 shillings. He says no man can tell an immigrant from a man that is coming here on business. If my friend lived in New York he would not have made that statement. The great body of immigrants——

Mr. HEPBURN. Why, I spent three months in investigating this matter, and I have seen thousands of these people where the gentleman has seen one.

Mr. PERKINS. If a man can not tell a man coming from Italy and Poland or Hungary when he comes in on the train from Canada and reaches the port of New York—if the inspector can not tell the difference between such a man and that of an English-speaking man living in Canada—he must be a dull inspector.

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, he could tell that; but he could not tell from his appearance how long he was going to sojourn in the United States, and that is the real question.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, this bill is a mere police and sanitary measure. It excludes beggars and insane persons, anarchists, and other classes inimicable to the public peace, public morality, and public health. It aims at that and nothing else. It does not aim to prevent the incursion of the hordes that annually come to this country for the purpose of temporarily engaging in mining, working in the lumber camps, and manufactories, and in railroad construction, intending to return to their own country when they have saved a small competence. It does not pretend to prohibit or prevent the addition of these hundreds and thousands of stalwart, able-bodied laborers to the number already at work in this country. Its enactment would not prevent the owners of our coal mines from populating the regions in which they are located with classes of alien laborers socially unfit for citizenship, who care nothing about citizenship, and are therefore essentially disqualified from becoming Americans.

Its enactment would not put an end to the systematic promotion of undesirable immigration by the steamship companies. As for the provision forbidding the owners of the trans-Atlantic lines from thus promoting undesirable immigration we all know it will not have a feather's weight in preventing the evil practice. As long as the law tolerates the addition of undesirable alien laborers to the laboring classes already here, the steamship companies will continue to promote the business they have heretofore fostered so carefully.

When this bill shall become a law (if it does become a law), how easy it will be for the Congress responsible for it to claim credit for the passage of a more stringent immigration law? From the beginning of this controversy down to this hour the demand of the workers in this country has been that the stalwart 6-foot laborer, capable of competing in the labor market with those already toiling for a living here—not the organ grinder or the beggar—shall be excluded. No effort has been made to meet this demand. This bill does not even squint at it. It is a wise police regulation.

In the interest of the maintenance of the public peace it excludes the anarchist, felons, and in general the lawless classes. In the interest of the public health it excludes those suffering from noxious diseases. But what have these restrictions to do with the greater and graver question involved? Absolutely nothing. From the beginning the laborers of this country have demanded the prevention of immigration, which is adding vast hordes of the lowest classes of European pauper labor to our population. We all know that this incursion of undesirable classes among the laboring classes is reducing the standard of living and the level of civilization in every city in the country and among all callings in which manual labor engages. Not only the seaboard cities, but all our large cities and the mining camps of Pennsylvania, Illinois, Ohio, Kansas, Colorado, and other mining States and nearly all places where there are manufacturing communities will soon cease to be American communities and become mere colonies of brutalized aliens, thousands of whom do not seek to learn our language or desire to learn the nature of our institutions. They are tempted to come to our shores by the one consideration that they can obtain a little better wages, save a little money, and return to their native countries after a term of years. Is the American Congress going to respond to the demand for the suppression of this kind of immigration?

The time is coming when a mere stump speech on the hustings by a lawmaker, citing the passage of such a measure as this, will not be received in quittance of our obligation to limit the immigration, not of beggars, cripples, organ grinders, and thieves, but of able-bodied laborers, most of whom are brought here by the great corporations and "captains of industry."

Mr. Chairman, I need not cite any proof that the complaints of the American laborer, who is the sufferer from this great evil, are just.

The tenement houses of our cities are infested by classes unknown in America a quarter of a century ago. Everywhere we see evidences of a change in the character of our laboring population. In every mining camp, in the industrial hives in our cities, on the construction trains—everywhere—we see men on whose countenances are stamped unmistakable evidences that they are not and can not become useful American citizens.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN. I ask an extension.

Mr. BARTLETT. I hope the gentleman will be granted unanimous consent to continue his remarks for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN. Mr. Chairman, who will point out in this measure a single section, a single line, a single syllable that aims at more than mere police and sanitary regulations? Is there a just demand for nothing more? Is there necessity for nothing more than this?

I believe the time is coming when, nothwithstanding the danger of being subjected to the criticism of demagogues who will seek to array the worthy elements of our foreign-born population against those who undertake to stand in the pathway of this evil, the time is coming when we must face the responsibility, when the American Congress must see to it that classes who in the very nature of things can not be Americanized shall be prohibited from taking up their domicile in the United States.

And in this connection another question arises. Our present naturalization laws were passed at a time when our immigration consisted of the very cream of the population of Europe. The large immigration between 1848 and 1860 was caused by political complications abroad. The great revolutionary movement of 1848 had provoked disquietude through all Europe, and had caused the general migration from the Germanic States of men who came here because they desired to live in a republic. They came here because they were republicans and sought the blessings of republican institutions. In those days those who came to our shores were compelled to make great sacrifices. If they were poor, it required years of economy to accumulate the necessary funds. Only the fittest came. Since that time the sources of European immigration have changed entirely. The immigration from Germany absolutely fell off between 1890 and 1900, while the immigration from other countries, of people who are confessedly less desirable as citizens, increased enormously.

The question which, sooner or later, must be answered by the American Congress is whether we are going to close the doors against the brutalized classes of alien laborers which until recently was almost unknown but which now form a large part of the annual addition to our population. I believe there is no civilized country on earth that has not within its borders persons who would be desirable as citizens of this country. Let them come. I think thousands are coming here every year whose presence will work injury to the welfare of the country. Bar them out. The question raised may be difficult, but if the Congress had done its duty long ago it would have been made utterly impossible for a shipload of laborers to come here from a European country, nine-tenths of them leaving their families behind them, not one in ten intending to settle in the country, and who, having worked one, two, or three years at the most, take their savings and return to their homes in the old country.

If this is to continue, the level of the wages and the standard of living of the laborer will continue to fall until finally under "the iron law" of wages, which allots to the laborer only the wage necessary to maintain him in such condition that he can continue to work and propagate his species, the American laborers as a class will sink to the level of their alien competitors—the level of European pauperism.

The question is whether the American citizen, native or naturalized, whether born here or in Germany, Holland, France,

Sweden, Norway, or Switzerland, is to be submitted to unlimited competition with the most debased classes of the Old World? Shall this unlimited competition against the pauperized classes of the Old World fix the standard of living, and thereby the standard of respectability of the American laborer? Shall we continue to permit alien laborers to leave their families behind, come here as mere sojourners, live and labor under conditions repulsive to all our ideas, hundreds occupying a single building, sleeping in bunks ranged on the wall much as the shelves in a store, and subsisting at nominal expense—are we to permit them to drag down the standard of living and the standard of self-respect hitherto prevailing among American wage-earners? If so, farewell to every hope and aspiration which labor has a right to indulge.

As a police measure this bill improves existing laws and I favor its passage. It does not even aim to prevent the immigration of able-bodied pauper laborers. Therefore it does not meet the necessities of the situation as they appear to the wage-earners of the country.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee on Immigration if he will accept this amendment: In line 7, after the words "foreign port," insert these words, "other than those on the Great Lakes," so that it will read "who shall come by steam, sail, or other vessel from any foreign port other than those on the Great Lakes to any port within the United States."

Mr. Chairman, at Niagara Falls visitors come in by rail across bridges; at Detroit they cross in ferry boats as well as on the cars, hundreds of travelers, not immigrants, who wish to visit and travel in our country. Under this bill they must pay a dollar and a half for the privilege of being in the country perhaps for an hour or two.

There is a line of boats running from Toronto to Wolcott on Lake Ontario, which is just below Lockport; also a line running from Toronto to Charlotte, 6 or 7 miles from Rochester, and a line of boats running from Toronto to Lewiston, at the mouth of the Niagara River, and during the summer these boats are filled with travelers from England, Germany, France, and other countries, passengers who land in Canada and want to visit Niagara Falls. They come, also, by way of the St. Lawrence from Quebec and Montreal for the purpose of visiting that historic and picturesque spot. Now, it seems absurd that these passengers, travelers, pleasure seekers for the moment, should be compelled to pay a dollar and a half each simply for landing in the country for two or three days to visit Niagara Falls and the other places of interest in that vicinity.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I will state to the gentleman that the amendment makes it apply equally to railroads as it does to steamboats.

Mr. ALEXANDER. It has not been accepted yet.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. No; that is what we are discussing, that amendment making it apply to every passenger who crosses by rail, as well as boat, to your city or any other.

Mr. RUCKER. Does the gentleman understand that this language does not apply to any citizen of Canada?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Certainly; but there are hundreds of English people, Scotch people, and other foreigners, who visit Canada in the summer, who go over to Niagara Falls and other places of interest on this side for a day or two, and the word "passenger" would compel them to pay a dollar and a half for the privilege of crossing from Clifton to Niagara Falls, just to spend an hour or two.

Mr. SHATTUC. If it were my own money that was at stake, and the gentleman asked for this contribution to his people, I would give it, but the United States Government needs this money.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Oh, no; it does not.

Mr. SHATTUC. Besides this, the administration of this law will be in the hands of our Secretary of the Treasury, and he will not make rules that will be obnoxious at all.

Mr. HILL. Oh, well, let us have it a matter of law.

Mr. ALEXANDER. What would the gentleman from Ohio say if the English Parliament should assess every American coming across the Channel to Dover a dollar and a half additional to his fare, simply for the privilege of visiting England?

Mr. SHATTUC. I should say they were a very enterprising set of people. [Laughter.]

Mr. BUTLER of Pennsylvania. Business people.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I move this amendment in line 7, after the words "foreign people," to insert the words "other than those on the Great Lakes," so that, with the other pending amendment, all visitors entering this country from Canada, other than citizens of Canada, may come without the payment of a dollar and a half, whether they come by rail or by boat.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Maine who have referred to amendments that they wish to offer, that the chairman of the committee [Mr. SHATTUC] has furnished the series of amendments which he desires to offer, and it will be in order first to pass upon the amendments submitted by the chairman, in order to avoid confusion. These amendments having been passed upon, the section can then be perfected by disposing of other amendments. Debate on this amendment is now exhausted, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I call for the reading of the amendment that we are voting on.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 1, page 1, line 8, by inserting after the word "States" a comma instead of a period, and by inserting after the word "States" the following: "or by any railway or any other mode of transportation from foreign contiguous territory to the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 12, amend by striking out after the word "vessel" the words "or by the alien passenger, if such alien passenger comes overland, within twenty-four hours after the arrival of such vessel in port, or by such overland alien passenger upon application for admission" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "or transportation line;" in line 25, page 2, after the word "immigration," insert the words "under the direction or;" so that it will read:

"That there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of $1.50 for each and every passenger not a citizen of the United States or of the Dominion of Canada or of the Republic of Mexico who shall come by steam, sail, or other vessel from any foreign port to any port within the United States, or by any railway or other mode of transportation from foreign contiguous territory to the United States. The said duty shall be paid to the collector of customs of the port or customs district to which said alien passenger shall come, or, if there be no collector at such port or district, then to the collector nearest thereto, by the master, agent, owner, or consignee of every such vessel or transportation line: * * * Provided, That the Commissioner-General of Immigration, under the direction or with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, etc."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. All the amendments submitted by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] have now been agreed to.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I have sent up an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 7, page 1, after the words "foreign ports," insert "others than those on the Great Lakes."

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SHATTUC. I move that debate on this section and all amendments thereto be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the section as amended by inserting immediately after the words "United States," in line 8, the words "upon every alien immigrant coming," and to strike out the word "or."

I would state, Mr. Chairman, the effect of that amendment if adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that all debate on this section and amendments has been closed.

Mr. PERKINS. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. After a motion to close debate has been agreed to, debate on the motion to strike out the last word is not in order.

Mr. PERKINS. I merely desire to explain the amendment, and I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the committee has determined that no debate shall be in order upon this section.

Mr. CANNON. Unanimous consent can always be given.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to be permitted to explain the amendment.

Mr. SHATTUC. What is it that the gentleman wants to explain?

Mr. PERKINS. I merely want to explain it, not to say one word in the way of argument.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, if this amendment should be adopted the result is this: The bill imposes upon every passenger that lands on the seaboard $1.50. This is not changed by the amendment. The operation of the law, which is the present law, remains. The provision of new law, which has been offered by the committee, is to impose a tax of $1.50 on every passenger who comes into this country from Mexico and Canada by rail. I think it is an unfair provision to impose that tax upon every "passenger," and the amendment is that the tax shall be imposed on every "immigrant" who comes by rail from Canada or Mexico.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. SHATTUC. I simply desire to say that the amendment ought not to pass.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. I have an amendment to offer.

After the word "Canada," in line 5, insert the following: "the Republic of Cuba.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. POWERS of Maine. Division.

Mr. LESSLER. What is it all about?

Mr. POWERS of Maine. To give the Republic of Cuba the same rights that we grant to Canada and Mexico, it being the only other country on this continent that we want to give it to.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 50, noes 22.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission into the United States: All idiots, insane persons, epileptics, and persons who have been insane within five years previous; persons who have had two or more attacks of insanity at any time previously; paupers; persons likely to become a public charge; persons afflicted with a loathsome or with a dangerous contagious disease; persons who have been convicted of a felony or other crime or misdemeanor involving moral turpitude; polygamists, anarchists, or persons who believe in or advocate the overthrow by force or violence of all government or of all forms of law, or the assassination of public officials; prostitutes, and persons who procure or attempt to bring in prostitutes or women for the purpose of prostitution; persons whose migration to the United States has been induced by offers, solicitations, promises, or agreements, parole or special, express or implied, of labor or work, or service of any kind in the United States; and also any person whose ticket or passage is paid for with the money of another, or who is assisted by others to come, unless it is affirmatively and satisfactorily shown that such person does not belong to one of the foregoing excluded classes; but this section shall not be held to prevent persons living in the United States from sending for a relative or friend who is not of the foregoing excluded classes: Provided, That nothing in this act shall exclude persons convicted of an offense purely political, not involving moral turpitude: And provided further, That skilled labor may be imported, if labor of like kind unemployed can not be found in this country; and the provisions of this section shall not be held to exclude professional actors, artists, lecturers, singers, ministers of any religious denomination, professors for colleges or seminaries, persons belonging to any recognized learned profession, or persons employed strictly as personal or domestic servants.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

Mr. SHATTUC. Does not the chairman of the committee take precedence?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Alabama will withhold his amendment, the chairman of the committee has an amendment recommended by the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for recognition when the committee is through.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers the following amendment on behalf of the committee, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 2, page 3, line 23, strike out the semicolon after the word "States" and insert a comma in lieu thereof, and insert "and those who have been, within one year from the date of application for admission to the United States, deported as being under offers, solicitations, or promises or agreement to perform labor or service of some kind therein."

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama submits an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill by adding as a new section, between lines 14 and 15, on page 4, the following:

"SEC. 3. That in addition to the persons excluded under the foregoing section, admission into the United States shall be denied to all persons over 15 years of age and physically capable of reading who can not read the English language or some other language; but an admissible immigrant or a person now in or hereafter admitted to this country may bring in or send for his wife, his children under 18 years of age, and his parents or grandparents over 50 years of age, if they are otherwise admissible, whether they are so able to read or not.

"That for the purpose of testing the ability of the immigrant to read the inspection officers shall be furnished with copies of the Constitution of the United States, printed on uniform pasteboard slips, each containing not less than 20 nor more than 25 words of said Constitution printed in the various languages of the immigrants in double small pica type. Each immigrant may designate the language in which he prefers the test shall be made, and shall be required to read the words printed on a slip in such language. No two immigrants listed on the same manifest shall be tested with the same slip. An immigrant failing to read as above provided shall not be admitted, but shall be returned to the country from which he came at the expense of the steamship or railroad company which brought him."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, on yesterday in general debate I made——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to say to the gentleman from Alabama and the committee that other gentlemen of the committee desire to offer amendments to section 2, and without objection those amendments will be considered before this.

Mr. SHATTUC. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio what is his point of order?

Mr. SHATTUC. I consider that it is not germane.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman makes the point of order that it is not germane. All I have to say is, that this is a bill for the restriction of immigration. The amendment offered restricts immigration, and I think it must be clearly germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Alabama that he is informed that there are other amendments to section 2. Section 2 ought to be perfected before it is passed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, no gentleman claimed the floor, and therefore I offered my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from California has an amendment to present to section 2.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I yield the floor with the amendment pending, Mr. Chairman, until section 2 is perfected.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be considered as pending as a new section while section 2 is being perfected.

The gentleman from California [Mr. COOMBS] sends up an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out on page 4, line 7, all after the word "turpitude" and all of lines 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, and 14.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I would like to hear the amendment read. I could not hear it.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California is recognized.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Is this amendment offered by the gentleman from California an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama?

The CHAIRMAN. It is not. The amendment offered by the gentleman from California is an amendment to perfect section 2. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama is a new section to the bill.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. And not an amendment to section 2?

The CHAIRMAN. No.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment has been twice reported; but without objection, it will be again read.

The Clerk again reported the amendment.

Mr. COOMBS. Mr. Chairman, I think that section 2 is intended to comprehend completely the classes of people who are to be excluded from coming into this country under this bill. The language which this amendment seeks to strike out, if left in, is such a qualification of the exclusion which is intended by the section, as, in my mind, to entirely invalidate and vitiate it.

Section 2 provides that idiots, insane persons, epileptics, paupers and those who may become a public charge, those infected with loathsome and contagious diseases, convicted of a felony or other crime not involving moral turpitude, polygamists, anarchists, prostitutes, etc., shall be excluded from coming into the United States. Now, on page 4, it is provided, as an exception to that rule, that those who may be professional actors, artists, lecturers, singers, ministers of any religious denomination, professors for colleges or seminaries, persons belonging to any recognized learned profession, or persons employed strictly as personal or domestic servants, are excepted, although they may be within the class prohibited. That is a fair construction of it, although, of course, it is not intended so by the committee.

Mr. PERKINS. It does not read that way.

Mr. COOMBS. An anarchist, if he is an artist, may be admitted. Learned professors may come in although they might be preachers of the doctrine of anarchy in their own country.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. COOMBS. Very well.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If a man comes into the country as an artist and he was found to be an anarchist at some time, under the provisions of this section he would be admitted as an artist but excluded as an anarchist, because there is a specific section in the bill which excludes anarchists.

Mr. COOMBS. That is the point of it; it would admit him as an artist, but it could not exclude him as an anarchist. He has a peculiar exemption under the provisions of this bill; and, though he is an artist, although he has all of the traits of character inhibited in the first provisions of the bill, yet being an artist, he has a right to come in. It is my opinion that this exception should be provided for in some other portion of the bill. I think the bill is faulty in that respect.

There is another part which I think must be stricken out.

Mr. GROW. Suppose it read "anarchists in any profession or business should be excluded."

Mr. COOMBS. That might perhaps be sufficient, I do not know. In lines 7 and 8 of this bill, on page 4, it is provided that skilled labor may be imported if the labor of a like kind not employed can not be found in this country.

I understand, Mr. Chairman, that at one time that may have been a necessary part of the material progress of this nation, when industries were in their infancy, when in the formative condition, it might have been material to our progress to bring men in here skilled in a particular line. That time has gone by. I see no occasion now, under our present system, of continuing in force a provision the reason for which has gone by and has become obsolete.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. COOMBS. Certainly.

Mr. ALEXANDER. I desire to ask the gentleman from California if his attention has ever been called to the manufacture of lenses used in large telescopes. In Buffalo we have a manufactory of that kind, the only one, I think, in the United States.

Our people have found it absolutely necessary to go to Germany to find skilled workmen who can grind those lenses. This is an infant industry; it is a growing industry; it is a most important industry; and if the Secretary of the Treasury had not found some way of allowing skilled laborers in that line of work to come in under existing laws, the factory to which I refer would have been seriously crippled.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. ADAMS obtained the floor.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] a question. Is he on this committee?

Mr. ADAMS. I have that honor.

Mr. CLARK. Then I want to ask him about two lines in section 2—lines 8 and 9 on page 4, which are printed in italics:

If labor of like kind unemployed can not be found in this country.

Now, will not that provision open the flood gates to the importation into this country of all kinds of contract labor?

Mr. ADAMS. I think not, because if there should be skilled labor unemployed in the country, capable of doing the work in question, the skilled labor from abroad could not be imported. On the other hand, if there is no unemployed labor suitable for that class of work, then we need these skilled laborers from abroad.

Mr. CLARK. Now, let me ask the gentleman another question. Who is to determine whether there is in this country unemployed skilled labor of the kind which it is proposed to bring in under contract?

Mr. ADAMS. The facts of the case would be submitted to the officers of the United States, and it would be for them to determine the operation of this provision, as in the case of other provisions with respect to immigrants.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I was about to reply to the gentleman from California [Mr. COOMBS]. I am afraid that gentleman's mind has been in such a state of excitement and tension regarding the Chinese-exclusion bill during the present session that he is unduly apprehensive in regard to any legislation which may undertake to regulate immigration in this country. I think he has stretched the language of this section of the bill in a way which unduly arouses his apprehensions, and might lead to misjudgment on the part of other gentlemen, unless proper explanation be made. The gentleman certainly does not wish to stop the development of our country in the arts or sciences or manufactures by preventing the importation of skilled laborers, when there is a stringent provision that such importation shall not take place unless we need such labor, and unless there is in this country no such labor unemployed.

Mr. COOMBS. Is it proposed in this bill that the importation of skilled laborers shall be regulated by the Secretary of the Treasury—that he shall determine in what cases such importation is proper?

Mr. ADAMS. This whole bill will be put into execution under regulations laid down by the Secretary of the Treasury for its enforcement.

Mr. COOMBS. If that is the case, then of course I should not be insistent with regard to that particular part of my amendment.

Mr. ADAMS. Then I will proceed to answer the other part of the gentleman's argument.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In response to the suggestion of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], I would like to state an instance that came within my knowledge where skilled mechanics were required in certain knitting mills, and no laborers of the necessary kind could be found unemployed in this country. Mechanics who were being brought in to meet that necessity were held up in the city of New York, but upon the presentation of the case to the Commissioner of the Bureau of Immigration and showing the facts those laborers were admitted to the country for that special and infant industry.

Mr. ADAMS. I could mention half a dozen of such industries. For instance, the silk industry, or the designing of patterns for cotton prints, etc. There are innumerable cases in which it may be necessary to import skilled labor to aid us in carrying on infant industries. I need not say to my friend from California that the genius of the American people is such that they are constantly creating new industries that demand development, and these new industries are entitled to the same protection that has been accorded to similar industries under similar circumstances in the past.

On one other point I would like to relieve the apprehension of the gentleman. He supposes that there may apply for admission as an immigrant some one who is a sort of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde—who is, we will suppose, an anarchist on one side and a play actor on the other. But in such a case, if there should be found on any side of the man's character any unfitness for his entrance into this country, he may be excluded.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I notice that this bill provides in section 2 that no person "convicted of a felony" shall be admitted. Now, I wish to ask whether there is any provision of the existing law or any proposed provision in this bill which will be effective in excluding persons of that class?

Mr. ADAMS. The provision of the law or of this bill on that subject will be just as effective as any law can be.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Does this bill amend the existing law in that respect? Does it make the present remedy applicable in such a case any more effective?

Mr. ADAMS. I think not.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Well, will the gentleman permit me to state briefly an incident that came under my notice showing the necessity for the amendment of the existing law in order to secure the exclusion of ex-convicts?

Mr. ADAMS. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. If it is simply proposed to leave the law as it is now, I think this incident will show the absolute necessity for some sort of remedy. I was in Chicago to see a friend, a lawyer, and was told that he was at the criminal court. I went there and he was engaged in the trial of a murder case. The defendant, Frank Mulkowski, was on the stand, a very intelligent appearing man about 40 years of age. He was convicted and hanged for murder. He had been in this country six months, had gone to his boarding house and murdered the wife of the man with whom he boarded, robbed her of her jewelry, rings, and a little watch or something of that kind. He had come straight from Europe, straight from a penitentiary after having served twenty years of a life sentence for a murder committed there when he was 19 years of age. So that the law to-day, if not to be amended by this bill, permits ex-convicts, ex-murderers to be pardoned in Europe and have free access to this country.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. But it does not permit it.

Mr. ADAMS. I will call the attention of the gentleman to the provision contained in line 13, page 3, which excludes "persons who have been convicted of a felony or other crime."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But it does not exclude them. You say they shall not be admitted, but they are admitted. Why was not that man kept out?

Mr. ADAMS. Of course you can not enforce a law anywhere unless you know that its provisions have been broken.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There is no provision of the law by which you can determine whether the man has been an ex-convict. Why is not some provision made requiring the man to bring a certificate from the mayor or some other officer of the town in which he resides that he is a person of good moral character before he is permitted to get on the ship, and not permit a man to come direct from the doors of a penitentiary, as Frank Mulkowski did, in Chicago, and commit murder six months after he comes here?

Mr. ADAMS. The gentleman may not be aware of the fact, but we have agents in Europe who are supposed to look into the records of these people who do come.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania permit me to call his attention to section 13 of this bill? The section provides generally for a list or manifest to be made out by the master of the vessel, showing the character of the person whom he is shipping over here, and it says that list or manifest shall be verified "by the signature and the oath or affirmation of the master or commanding officer or the first or second below him in command, taken before an immigration officer at the port of arrival, to the effect that he has caused the surgeon of said vessel sailing therewith to make a physical and oral examination of each of said aliens, and that from the report of said surgeon and from his own investigation he believes that no one of said aliens is an idiot, or insane person, or a pauper, or is likely to become a public charge, or is suffering from a loathsome or a dangerous contagious disease, or is a person who has been convicted of a felony or other crime or misdemeanor," etc.

That is the only provision in this bill to exclude ex-convicts from our shores, that the captain of the ship, interested in getting all the money he can from the people whom he brings over here, sends the surgeon of his own ship down to examine the people and see whether they have loathsome diseases, and on the report of that physician this officer makes oath that he thinks the man has never been convicted of a felony. It is a perfect farce on the face of it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMS. I will say as a matter of practice, because the law stands to-day as proposed by this bill, that the Treasury Department has what you might call detectives in Europe whose sole business is to look into the moral character of emigrants who may come out, and they keep track of the criminals and try to stop them. It would be impossible for this Government to have a recognized officer in Europe, under international law, to hunt these people up or to look into their records any more than in general, and as for demanding a certificate from the mayor or other officer of the place from which the emigrant comes, I think that would be a very stringent provision and would be casting a slur on every honest emigrant that comes to this country—that he must bring a certificate of character. It is not required.

Mr. COOMBS. May I interrupt the gentleman a minute, just to say that since the consideration of this proposed amendment the members of the committee sitting here have agreed upon an amendment which, I think, will meet my ideas and cure the objections I have urged. If it is agreeable to the committee, I should like to withdraw my amendment, in order that they may introduce theirs.

Mr. ADAMS. Being a member of the committee, I shall be very glad to acquiesce in the action of the committee.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will my friend from Pennsylvania permit me a moment?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes.

Mr. COOMBS. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to withdraw his proposed amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER rose and was recognized.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I understand that time has been yielded to me by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania can not yield time under the five-minute rule.

Mr. ADAMS. I had five minutes allowed to me, and I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that under the five-minute rule he can not yield his time.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER], a member of the committee, was to have been recognized next.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I believe we have framed an amendment which will meet all of the objections that have been urged to this section thus far. I will send it to the Clerk's desk and let the Clerk read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all between "country," in line 9, to the word "shall," in line 10, and insert the following: "And provided further, That the provisions of law applicable to contract labor."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri submits this amendment to be read in his remarks?

Mr. RUCKER. Yes. Now, Mr. Chairman, the qualifying clause of this proviso had reference to the contract-labor feature of this section, and with this amendment I think it is unobjectionable.

Mr. CLARK. How will that make it read?

Mr. RUCKER. It will make it read as follows:

And provided further, That skilled labor may be imported, if labor of like kind unemployed can not be found in this country: And provided further, That the provisions of this law applicable to contract labor shall not be held to exclude professional actors, artists, lecturers, singers, ministers of any religious denomination, professors for colleges or seminaries, persons belonging to any recognized learned profession, or persons employed strictly as personal or domestic servants.

It makes them amenable to all the other provisions of this law, excluding objectionable classes, but admits professional men and those engaged in skilled trades, ministers of the gospel, etc., even though they are under contract. Ministers of the gospel, as I understand, are sometimes contracted with and brought here to take charge of churches. Under the legal construction of the contract-labor law they are contracted with, and therefore can not come. A theatrical troupe or company can not be brought here under contract for the same reason; but with this provision, exempting them from the operations of the contract feature of the law, it still leaves them amenable to all other provisions, and if they are afflicted with a contagious disease or if they are anarchists or in any other way objectionable to this law or come within any of the other excluded classes, then they could not come at all.

Mr. RAY of New York. If the gentleman will permit, I simply desire to call his attention to the fact that the words "and provided further" are equivalent to the word "except," and therefore, under section 2 as it stands, and under the language that you have inserted, under the pretense that a man's labor was skilled labor and that labor of a like kind unemployed can not be found in this country, or that he was an actor, or an artist, or a lecturer, or a singer, or a minister of the gospel, or a professor of a college, he would have to be admitted, even if an anarchist, a felon, diseased, insane, etc. In other words, such a person would not be within the meaning of the law or the provisions of section 2, even if he had all the diseases and defects—physical, mental, and moral—that you have described in the section because the exception is absolute and would not be excluded; and while I do not care to interfere with the bill in any way, I simply call attention to it, because you nullify the real purpose of the entire section by putting in those words and exceptions in the form the section now assumes. These exceptions are made by treaties, generally, and such persons should be admitted if not diseased, or if sound mentally and morally, etc.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I can not accept the interpretation and the definition of the gentleman from New York, even if the provision of the contract-labor law shall not be held to include these gentlemen.

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, why not remove any objection or any question about it by adding an amendment at the end of that section. You provide that skilled labor shall come in. You provide that it shall not exclude actors, etc. Why not add at the end of the section, "if not within the other prohibited classes hereinbefore mentioned."

Mr. RUCKER. That is the purpose of it.

Mr. RAY of New York. Then say so.

Mr. RUCKER. I have no objection to that.

Mr. RAY of New York. Then I ask to add at the end of the section "if not within the other prohibited classes hereinbefore mentioned."

Mr. MANN. Is not one of the prohibited classes those who are under contract?

Mr. RAY of New York. Not in that section.

Mr. MANN. It is all in the same section.

Mr. RAY of New York. I would say, then, that perhaps that ought to be looked to a little more closely, and we can return to it hereafter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. SHATTUC. I ask unanimous consent that the time of my colleague may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the time of his colleague be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. COOMBS. May I interrupt the gentleman? I would make this suggestion. When the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is accepted, and then the amendment of the gentleman from New York is accepted, it will cure it entirely. One should precede in its acceptance and the other should follow.

Mr. RUCKER. I would like to have the amendment read again.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. WACHTER. I would like to have the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks that the amendment be reported. Without objection the Clerk will report the amendment. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that the Clerk is unable to make the amendment coincide with the language of the bill. Will the gentleman from Missouri kindly follow the reading of the amendment by the Clerk?

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after "country," in line 9, to the word "shall," in line 10, and insert the following:

Mr. RUCKER. Wait a minute, Mr. Clerk. That is on page 4.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out all after "country," in line 9, to the word "shall," in line 10.

Mr. RUCKER. That ought to be amended so as to read between the word "country," in line 9, and the word "shall," in line 10.

The CLERK. To and including the word "shall?"

Mr. RUCKER. To the word "shall." Between "country" and "shall."

The Clerk read as follows:

And insert the following: Provided further, "That the provision of law applicable to contract labor," so that it will read: "And provided further, That the provisions of law applicable to contract labor shall not be held to include professional actors," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will correct the amendment.

There was no objection.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Unless there are further amendments to section 2——

Mr. RAY of New York. Now, I understood the amendment I suggested was to be accepted, to add at the end of the section, "Provided such persons are not within the other prohibited classes herein before specified."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York offer his amendment?

Mr. RAY of New York. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

Add at the end of the section: "Provided, That such persons are not within the other prohibited classes hereinbefore specified."

Mr. CURRIER. Are not contract laborers in the prohibited classes?

Mr. RAY of New York. You say "that skilled labor may be imported if labor of like kind unemployed can not be found in this country." Now, you say that the provisions of this section shall not be held to exclude "professional actors, artists, lecturers, singers, ministers of religious denominations, professors of colleges, or persons belonging to any learned profession or persons employed strictly as personal or domestic servants," and then the amendment added to that would be "if not within the other prohibited classes hereinbefore specified."

Mr. CURRIER. But contract labor would be within the prohibited class.

Mr. MANN. In the beginning of the section are the words "that the following classes of aliens shall be excluded from admission into the United States."

Mr. RAY of New York. That is right.

Mr. MANN. One of those classes is composed of persons whose immigration into the United States has been induced by "offers, solicitations, promises, or agreements, etc., to labor and work," so that we could have this one prohibited class. Now, probably the court would construe your amendment only applied to the other prohibited class, because this is one of the classes in this section.

Mr. MCCALL. The gentlemen can frame it so as not to make such a strain on the semicolon. [Laughter.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that we may go on with the bill and return to this paragraph at a future time, and I will put my amendment in such shape as to be unobjectionable.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that when this paragraph is perfected it may be passed without prejudice as far as returning to it is concerned.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I object, Mr. Chairman. I have an amendment that I wish to offer.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding, after the word "classes," in line 2, page 4, the following: "Provided, That all persons immigrating to the United States above the age of 16 years shall produce a certificate of good character from the local municipal authority of the country in which they last resided, or of some official representing the United States in such country."

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The question was considered, and the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether I am in order at this time, but I would like to offer an amendment to this bill which appears to me to be of great importance. It would take the place, in my judgment, of what is going to be proposed by some gentleman on the other side as an amendment, called the educational test. My amendment will much more effectually exclude undesirable immigrants.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understood from the Chair that as I yielded for amendments to the section I was to be recognized when it came to an amendment for a new section. If the gentleman from Missouri rises to offer a new provision, I think I should have precedence.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is correct in his statement. The Chair was listening to hear the full statement of the gentleman from Missouri to be sure that the Chair was right. No amendments are in order except the amendments to perfect section 2.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Very well, Mr. Chairman; I am willing to withhold my amendment.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, it has been an hour or more since my amendment was read, and I would like to have it again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the bill by adding as a new section, between lines 14 and 15 on page 4, the following:

"SEC. 3. That in addition to the persons excluded under the foregoing section, admission into the United States shall be denied to all persons over 15 years of age and physically capable of reading who can not read the English language or some other language; but an admissible immigrant or a person now in or hereafter admitted to this country may bring in or send for his wife, his children under 18 years of age, and his parents or grandparents over 50 years of age, if they are otherwise admissible, whether they are so able to read or not.

"That for the purpose of testing the ability of the immigrant to read the inspection officers shall be furnished with copies of the Constitution of the United States, printed on uniform pasteboard slips, each containing not less than 20 nor more than 25 words of said Constitution printed in the various languages of the immigrants in double small pica type. Each immigrant may designate the language in which he prefers the test shall be made, and shall be required to read the words printed on a slip in such language. No two immigrants listed on the same manifest shall be tested with the same slip. An immigrant failing to read as above provided shall not be admitted, but shall be returned to the country from which he came at the expense of the steamship or railroad company which brought him."

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. I understood this was offered as a new section—as section 14.

The CHAIRMAN. No; section 3.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is offered as a new section between lines 14 and 15 on page 4.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane, and I will not take up the time of the committee to discuss it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment is so purely germane that I will not occupy the time of the committee, and I ask for a ruling by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would point out in passing on this question that an examination of this bill shows that it is a general immigration measure, the title being "to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States." Section 35 repeals all other laws inconsistent with this law. Any amendment to this bill, in the opinion of the Chair, which is clearly and distinctly connected logically with the general scope and intent of the bill would be germane.

Section 2 provides restrictions upon which aliens shall enter this country; it limits the number of aliens by classes who may enter this country. This amendment provides for a new section, adds a new restriction, an additional restriction, to the class of persons who may enter under our immigration laws.

It is not the province of the Chair to pass on the merits or demerits of any amendment, or its wisdom or justice. It appears to the Chair that this amendment is clearly, distinctly, and logically connected with the general scope of a bill regulating the immigration of aliens into the United States, and under these circumstances the Chair feels constrained to overrule the point of order and hold that the amendment is germane to the bill.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Now, Mr. Chairman, on yesterday I explained to the House what this amendment was. There may be some members here this morning that were not present yesterday afternoon, and I merely desire to occupy the time of the committee for a very few moments, to state what is the object and purpose of this amendment.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the gentleman's attention——

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman from Tennessee will wait until I have finished, I will answer his question. There is an impression in some portions of the United States and with a large number of people that there are some restrictions on immigration to this country other than paupers, criminals, and persons unhealthy and blind and disabled, but as a matter of fact there are none. Now, this provision merely is intended to provide for an educational test as to the admission of immigrants into the United States.

It is a very liberal test, it is a very fair test, and it is not harsh or restrictive in any particular. It merely provides that the man who is coming to this country to become a citizen of the United States, to have a voice in the management of our Government, and to exercise the right of governing us as well as himself, shall be able to read the Constitution of the United States when he enters our country for that purpose, either in the English language or in his own language.

It further allows that man to bring with him his children who are under the age of 18 years, whether they can read and write or not, and allows him to bring with him his parents and grandparents, whether they can read or write or not, if they are over 50 years of age, thereby providing that families shall not be separated, allowing the whole family to come here together.

Now, why should we adopt such an amendment? It is certainly liberal; it is certainly reasonable so far as it goes. Why should we say that an educational test shall be established instead of adopting some other method? Simply because the educational test comes nearer to accomplishing what we want to do with as little risk, as little expense to the Government of the United States as any other method that can be devised.

I recognize, as I said yesterday, that the educational test is not always a test of intelligence; but what we want to do is to encourage immigration to this country from northern Europe. We want the Swedes, the Norwegians, the Frenchmen, the German, the Irishmen, the Englishmen, the Scotchmen, and persons from intelligent Europe to come here. We want to keep our lands open for them. Now, sir, the statistics show that of the people coming from that portion of the world as immigrants to this country only about 5 per cent can not read, 95 per cent can. Therefore, of the select class of immigrants that we want, we shall, if this amendment be adopted, get 95 per cent and shall only reject 5 per cent. On the other hand, of the class of immigrants that we do not want—the people from southern Italy—43 per cent of those can not read or write, as the statistics show; but really the percentage is greater, because these statistics have been gathered by simply taking the word of the immigrants when they come here, without making any actual test.

We have simply taken their own statements. Therefore if we are right in wanting to exclude that class from admission into the United States, then by the adoption of this amendment we exclude 43 per cent of this undesirable class and only 5 per cent of the desirable class of immigrants. This test is to be made at the port when they arrive here; but the steamship company that gathers them up and brings them here—the steamship company and their agents—will apply the test before they leave the country on the other side, because under the provisions of this amendment if the immigrant can not comply with the test the steamship company must return him to the land whence he came. Therefore very few who can not comply with the test will come here and need be returned.

Now, why should we adopt the amendment? I say it is as much our duty to protect our country against undesirable immigrants from Europe as it is to protect the children in our homes from undesirable society.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KLEBERG. Mr. Chairman, in addition to the reasons which I gave yesterday to show that this amendment should not be adopted—that it would tend to exclude a desirable class of immigrants, men who would do the drudgery that this country requires and which possibly the American laborer refuses to perform—in addition to that reason as showing that it would be unwise and impolitic to adopt the amendment, I wish to state this additional reason: That it will not only exclude people who can not read or write, but will have the effect of frightening away from our shores the desirable class of immigration described by my friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. He admits that under his amendment it will be necessary that the test be applied on the American shore.

Now, if this threat be held out to the German immigrants (to whom it seems bouquets have been thrown by various speakers), I predict that very few Germans, unless they are professors or scientific men, will be willing to undergo an examination on this side of the Atlantic upon a technical document like the Constitution, whether it is to be read in one language or another. Such people—people who come over here to earn an honest living and who are conceded to be a desirable addition to our citizenship—will ponder a long time before they will make a long journey across the ocean in order to submit themselves to an examination by some "smart Aleck" of an inspector who may refuse them admission because they have not read with the proper emphasis or with the proper observance of punctuation a technical document like the Constitution of the United States. I warn gentlemen on the other side of the House as well as on this that if they are going to insert any drastic restrictions like this in the present bill, they may just as well put in the bill the declaration "We do not want any immigration of any class."

I agree perfectly with the ruling of the Chair; I have no complaint to make on that score. But I hope that unless this amendment be properly amended—and I do not see how it can be amended, because I believe the nature of the provision is such as to place it beyond the power of surgery—it may be voted down, because when you make that kind of a threat and say that people before they can emigrate to this country must submit to a kind of teacher's examination upon the shores of the United States, you will have very few to emigrate to this country, and we shall see the stream of hardy immigrants who have been coming to our shores for all these years turned toward South America or some other country where they will not be pestered with such drastic restrictions as these.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] which provides that no person shall hereafter come into this country who is unable to read and write the Constitution of the United States is a most dangerous and selfish proposition. I am opposed to it, and I am opposed to the bill with that proposition in it. I am surprised that it should be offered by one of the leading Democrats of this House, and apparently favored by nearly all of the Democrats. Slurs have been cast by some gentlemen against the immigration to our country from southern Europe. The Italian, Polish, and Bohemian immigrants have been harshly denounced. I rise again to say a word in their favor.

I assert that they do not make bad citizens. I say, on the contrary, that they make good citizens. Most of them are hard working and economical. They come to this land partly for greater liberty and partly because they can do better here. They leave home and friends and family on the other side of the ocean, and, enduring all sorts of hardships, they come here because of the hope that their children may enjoy greater comforts and a better education than they or their fathers were permitted to enjoy. I do not care whether they can read or write when they come here or not. The love of liberty is not confined to those who can read and write. The love of children is not denied to those who can neither read nor write. Reading and writing do not determine intelligence. These immigrants coming here to us have learned how to do their work and do it well. That is sometimes better than knowing how to read and write. In my opinion it would be better to keep out the mechanic who can read and write and who comes here in competition with the mechanic in our country rather than to keep out the laborer who, after he arrives here, will consume with his family his share of the products produced by others.

I am not in favor of a narrow-minded, selfish, stingy view of immigration.

Mr. Chairman, I understand very well that there is quite a prevailing impression upon the part of the people of our country of American descent who have not come in contact with the foreign-born population or their children that the foreign-born population, or a very large proportion of it coming here—possible ignorant so far as reading and writing are concerned—is a menace to the future of our country. Now, I happen to represent from the city of Chicago what would be known there as a silk-stocking district, but I deny all of those charges concerning the foreign-born population and their descendants, and I say without hesitation that an observation of some years in our city, largely composed of foreign-born population, and more than half composed of people foreign born and their children, has convinced me that the children of these people coming here from other countries, attending the public schools, taking an interest, as they do, in public affairs, make just as good citizens as those whose ancestors came over in the Mayflower.

Observation everywhere in these large cities, where you come in practical daily contact and experience with the descendants of the foreign-born population, is to the effect that they take a greater interest in public affairs, oftentimes, than the Americans themselves; that they give as great attention to every question of public policy; that they become the very best of citizens, the children almost invariably attending public schools. I heard the gentleman here yesterday read an editorial from the Post of this city, purporting to quote a statement by some gentleman from the Austrian Parliament. That statement, if ever made, was untrue. You go into the city of New York and you will find with their books under their arms, going to school, the descendants of the children of the foreign-born population in larger proportion than you will find in the purely American neighborhoods.

Our American people have gotten to the point in many places where the wealthy think it is unwise to send their children to the public schools, but the foreign-born citizen sends his children to the public school, where they come in contact with all classes and where they are prepared to become good public-spirited citizens. The city of Chicago is composed largely of the foreign-born people. We have a population of the Polish larger than any other city in the country; we have a population in many of the nationalities larger than the cities in the countries from which they came. They are among the best citizens we have in the city of Chicago. It is true that to a certain extent they yield a preference to their own nationality, but I have yet to see a native of a foreign country who is more clannish than the native of America itself.

There is less cry on their part of nationality than there is on the part of the American citizens. Oh, yes, perhaps they may have been ignorant when they came. Their children are not ignorant after they have been raised here and sent to the public schools, and the first generation makes good citizens, the second generation makes better citizens, and there is no occasion for the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], whom I highly respect, to offer the proposition that he has. I have a few Polish people in my district, and the only evidence of ignorance that I find on their part is that almost without exception they vote the Democratic ticket [laughter], but I have belief and hope that as their children go to the public schools and become educated, as they will, that they will become wise enough to abandon not merely the leadership of my friend upon this proposition but upon the other heresies of government which he constantly advocates. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Chairman, when the amendment was being discussed imposing a tax of a dollar and a half upon people coming into this country from Canada and Mexico and other countries, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] said that an amendment materially affecting that amendment——

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. We are not discussing that question of a dollar and a half.

Mr. McCALL. If the gentleman will have patience I will, in my own way, get to a discussion of the question. It was said that it would have an adverse affect upon the bill to change it in that particular. Now, that proposition to impose a tax of a dollar and a half upon immigrants would have no more effect in restricting immigration to this country than a mere cobweb; it would keep out nobody whom it was not desired to have here.

The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], which is now pending, is an amendment that will restrict. It will shut out a great number of immigrants. I am not opposed to those people to whom this amendment would apply—I am not hostile to them, but I believe it would be wise for us to pass some measure that would have the effect of restricting to a certain extent immigration to this country. Some six years ago I offered a bill in substance in the form of this amendment. It was considered by the Committee on Immigration; it was exhaustively debated in the House of Representatives; it came to a vote, and it passed this House by 195 to 26.

At that time we had been having hard times in this country. There was a great industrial depression. The labor market was overstocked, and the cry of labor to Congress was for some measure that would give relief. We are not in that condition to-day; but I want to call the attention of this committee to this consideration: We protect the products of labor; our great corporations that are engaged in manufacturing have their products protected; but the labor, that which is the chief element in that production, they get free of duty; and they are entirely willing, while their product is protected, that they be permitted to bring into this country almost unlimited numbers of laborers to diminish the cost of production.

Now, I fear we shall at some time in the future see industrial depression again. We shall have overproduction; we are going to have hard times, and then we shall have the same cry of labor again. I submit that the time for us to treat this subject is now, so that we may not have a menace to our labor; so that our laborers, perhaps in the near future, may not be compelled to enter a grinding competition with each other and thus induce a ruinous decline of wages.

Mr. ADAMS. Are we protected against the capital of Europe?

Mr. McCALL. No; we do not need any protection against the capital of Europe. But I would like to ask my friend if he has not repeatedly held forth to the people of this country that we needed to protect our labor against the laborers of Europe?

Mr. ADAMS. Yes; we do.

Mr. McCALL. And I would like to ask my friend further if he did not vote for this bill six years ago?

Mr. ADAMS. We do need to protect our labor against the laborers of Europe, but that is no reason why we should not allow others to come here to enjoy the privileges of this country; and then we will protect them. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. If his object is to restrict immigration to this country, either in toto or any particular race, why not meet the issue fairly and squarely, and pass a law stopping all immigration, if that is the evil? Or, if it is against any particular race or class of people, why not pass a law against them, and not try by indirection, by an educational test, to get that done which you do not meet fairly and squarely? Do not keep out the honest, healthy man, who loves liberty as much as the most highly educated man in the world. Do not keep him out simply because he can not read and write. Let him contribute to the country his labor, which is just as valuable as money or any other consideration.

Mr. McCALL. I did not yield to the gentleman for a speech, but I asked him if he did not vote for this proposition when it was before the House six years ago.

Mr. ADAMS. I think not.

Mr. McCALL. I should be very much surprised to find that the RECORD showed he did not.

Mr. ADAMS. I think not.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding:

"Provided, That all persons, whether able to read the English language or some other language or not able to do so, who shall enter the United States except at the seaports thereof, or at Vanceboro, Me.; Newport or St. Albans, Vt.; Plattsburg, Niagara Falls, or Buffalo, N. Y.; Detroit or Sault Ste. Marie, Mich.; Pembina, N. Dak.; Sumas, Wash.; Laredo, El Paso, or Eagle Pass, Tex., or Nogales, Ariz., shall be adjudged to have entered the country unlawfully and shall be deported as by law provided."

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] desire to be heard in favor of the amendment which he has offered?

Mr. SHATTUC. Yes; I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SHATTUC. It is held out to us that it is the desire of a large number of gentlemen in this House to restrict immigration. If we take their word for it, that seems to be all they want; that they are honest in their declaration that they want to keep out undesirable immigration, or, as I put it, undesirable aliens. Now, to put up the barriers at New York and on the Atlantic seaboard, as is proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], is simply to send these rejected people around, to come in over our frontier through Canada. There is no question about this at all, that there are a hundred thousand who come in in that way every year.

There is no question at all but what at least 50 per cent of the paupers, the insane, and the people who are fit subjects for our penal and charitable institutions who are turned away from our shores at New York come in through Canada. Before we get through with this I am determined to know just what part of this House is absolutely sincere and acting in good faith in relation to these matters. I do not propose to let it go without a record. I propose to find out who these people are who stand here and brag all the while that a good German, a good Englishman, or a good Irishman should not come to this country when they are willing to turn the paupers and harlots and insane and thieves away from our Atlantic ports, only to allow them to go around through Canada and come into our country in that way.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SHATTUC. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Your amendment to my amendment is merely intended to designate the places at which immigrants shall come into this country?

Mr. SHATTUC. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I am perfectly willing to accept that.

Mr. SHATTUC. Now, I want to say this, gentlemen: I see no objection to taking the question of an educational test up by itself, but it is my candid judgment that this bill ought not to meet with any riders at all. You also know that we have not revised the immigration laws for the last twenty-five years because certain elegant gentlemen of the East who have so many of these special features on their mind have persisted for years in forcing them to the front, and they kill every good measure by loading good bills down.

Now, I believe, with the advice of some distinguished attorneys of this House—the most distinguished, because I have never heard one of them deny it—that we can have an educational-test bill that would be satisfactory to every person here, and we can do it in such a way that it will not interfere with the treaty obligations that the United States has with other countries. I want to urge you now to consider first one thing. Would it not be better to defeat this educational-test amendment now, entirely, and let it go back to the committee, and I will promise you a bill either for or against it? I do not know at this moment whether the members of the Committee on Immigration are for it or against it.

Now, I want to correct a statement made by the gentleman from Indiana yesterday, when he said he had it from me that my committee was against it. He never came before the committee. I do not want to impute to him any wrong. He did not intend to do so. He is one of those good attorneys that would not deliberately prevaricate and would not misrepresent. I do not now know how the committee stands. But I do protest in the interest of honest, fair play not to pile a lot of new issues on it and defeat the bill.

Mr. WATSON. I would like to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. SHATTUC. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. WATSON. The gentleman says they will bring in a report either favoring an educational test or opposing it. How can the committee bring in a report opposing a bill and have it considered in this committee?

Mr. SHATTUC. You can tell better than I can, for you went to the Speaker and found out how.

Mr. WATSON. I found out that you could not do it.

Mr. SHATTUC. We could report.

Mr. WATSON. But the gentleman says he will bring in a report.

Mr. SHATTUC. I did say something of the kind.

Mr. WATSON. Whether the House is for it or is opposed to it; and if the committee is opposed to it, it stands on no ground.

Mr. SHATTUC. I said I would submit it to the committee and see if they would not do one thing or the other.

Mr. WATSON. If they do the other, we will be out.

Mr. SHATTUC. If you will get our great constitutional lawyers, and we have a great many of them here, to bring in a proper bill in favor of the educational test, I will guarantee that we will consider it in the committee, but I ask you, gentlemen, to let us pass this bill without any riders.

Mr. RAY of New York. I would like to ask a question in that connection. Have you discussed this matter of an educational test in connection with this bill in the committee? I do not ask what you said.

Mr. SHATTUC. We invited everybody that wanted to to come before that committee.

Mr. RAY of New York. Was the question of the educational test discussed in your committee?

Mr. SHATTUC. We went over the matter. We have had hearings, but it was our understanding that it was better for us not to report one way or the other upon an educational test or on the questions affecting the Canadian frontier.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SHATTUC. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the time of the gentleman may be extended for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHATTUC. Now, this bill that is presented by these two distinguished lawyers—and I guess they are, for both of them admit it, the gentleman from Alabama and the gentleman from Indiana—is the most loosely drawn measure ever presented to this House, so far as I know. If I had a clerk 15 years of age who could not draw a better bill than that I would discharge him, and I have had many. Neither one of these gentlemen drew up this bill; neither one of them wrote a word of it. It says:

> In addition to the persons excluded under the foregoing sections, admission into the United States shall be denied to all persons over 15 years of age and physically capable of reading who can not read the English language or some other language.

I want to state to these gentlemen who have been talking about Canada, in discussing another section of this bill, that you will have to have a man standing at the border with a primer and spelling blocks to see whether the immigrant is educated. "Every person coming into the United States must be able to read." That means a man coming from Canada or Mexico, and you could not enforce it if it passed.

Now, in my time I would like to have the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] state what he thinks about this proposed amendment. He was solicitor of the Treasury, and if you have any doubt about the constitutionality of this bill, refer to him. The Speaker having no confidence in me, because I was a plain ex-railroad man, did submit it to the gentleman from Iowa. Now, as an educational test, I would like to have the gentleman from Iowa analyze this proposed amendment and see if he does not think it is a monstrosity. [Laughter.]

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SHATTUC. Very well.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Section 2, the one under consideration, provides that idiots and insane persons and epileptics, etc., shall be excluded; and also persons afflicted with diseases, etc.; and then at the end of the section is this proviso——

Mr. SHATTUC. That proviso has been amended.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Very well; that was done while I was out.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, as I said before, I propose at the proper time to offer an amendment, or rather a substitute, for the educational test, which in my judgment, and in the judgment of those who have given some attention to the great problem of immigration, will more effectually meet the evils of undesirable immigration than the amendment of my friend from Alabama. Before I offer it, however, I hope the committee will bear with me while I say a few words in regard to the educational test.

The amendment proposed means this, that every man or woman coming to the United States must show his or her ability to read 20 or 25 lines of the Constitution of the United States, and not until then will he or she be accorded the privilege of admission to this country.

Let us see what a President of the United States said on this proposition. I will read it myself. The same bill was before Congress a few years ago and a Democratic President vetoed it, and in doing so he used this language:

> The best reason that could be given for this radical restriction of immigration is the necessity of protecting our population against degeneration and saving our national peace and quiet from imported turbulence and disorder.
> I can not believe that we would be protected against these evils by limiting immigration to those who can read and write in any language twenty-five words of our Constitution. In my opinion it is infinitely more safe to admit a hundred thousand immigrants who, though unable to read and write, seek among us only a home and opportunity to work than to admit one of those unruly agitators and enemies of governmental control, who can not only read and write, but delights in arousing by inflammatory speech the illiterate and peacefully inclined to discontent and tumult. Violence and disorder do not originate with illiterate laborers. They are rather the victims of the educated agitator. The ability to read and write, as required in this bill, in and of itself, affords, in my opinion, a misleading test of contented industry and supplies unsatisfactory evidence of desirable citizenship or a proper apprehension of the benefits of our institutions. If any particular element of our illiterate immigration is to be feared for other causes than illiteracy, these causes should be dealt with directly, instead of making illiteracy the pretext for exclusion to the detriment of other illiterate immigrants against whom the real cause of complaint can not be alleged.

This, Mr. Chairman, states the case in a nut shell.

Mr. LEVER. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes; if the committee will extend my time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have fifteen minutes, reckoning from the time he started.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks that the gentleman from Missouri may use fifteen minutes for his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LEVER. I would like to ask the gentleman to let me read a few sentences from the message of another President in this connection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. LEVER. Half a minute.

> The second object of a proper immigration law ought to be to secure by a careful and not merely perfunctory educational test some intelligent capacity to appreciate American institutions and act sanely as American citizens.

That is from the message of President Roosevelt December 3, 1901.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I do not object to that sentiment expressed by President Roosevelt in his great message, but it will be noted that the President carefully refrained from indorsing a proposition such as is offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. LEVER. Now, will you allow me to read from the Republican platform of 1896?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Oh, no; we know all about that. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. Perhaps it would do more good if the gentleman would read it to the other side of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. WACHTER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the gentleman from Missouri offer his amendment. I do not know what it is he is talking about.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment will be, in my judgment—and I have devoted twenty years to the study of the question of immigration—the effect of it, in my humble judgment, will be to shut out those whom we do want and to let in those whom we do not want. It will let in the soft-handed, easy-going fellow, and exclude the horny-handed son of toil. It welcomes the lazy, half-educated good-for-nothing who goes around asserting that the world owes him a living without condescending to work for it, and shuts the door of the Republic in the face of the honest, industrious, and struggling man who, though not able to read, comes here with two strong arms, a healthy mind, and a determination to make this country his and his children's home, and to earn his citizenship as well as his daily bread by the sweat of his brow.

One is perhaps driven to these shores against his will and by circumstances he does not care to explain—I refer to the educated immigrant—while the other comes voluntarily, with the hope of a better future in his heart and with the expectation that by honest toil, to which he is accustomed, by thrift and frugality, he will succeed in making his lot a happy one, because he is in the land of civil and religious liberty of which he has heard so much and which has filled his dreams for many a day. Yet it is proposed here to extend the hand of welcome to the former and not only withhold it from the latter but to send him back to the dungeon whence he came.

Do you know what this means—the deportation of a man? It means that you brand him for life. When he goes back to his old surroundings the question will be naturally asked by his neighbors, "Why did you return? You must have committed some overt act, some crime or other which caused the great country beyond the seas to return you to your old home." Nobody in the whole civilized world will believe that this country would return an honest man merely because he has not had the opportunity of learning how to read. My friends, by adopting this amendment you would go on record as making it the standard of Americanism that a man, no matter whether he is honest, if he has not had the opportunity to learn, will be punished on account of the lack of that opportunity on his part and be sent back where he came from.

Heretofore the rule recognized by the American people has been that an honest man, with an honest willingness to become a good American citizen, and by honest work to help build up our great country, that such a man should be welcomed by us; and it is due to this policy, my friends, that our country has been built up.

Such arguments as those used to-day by my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] we heard advanced in the early fifties, when the Know-Nothing party attempted to shut out all immigration for all time to come. Supposing, my friends, that that party could have had its way, supposing at that time all immigration should have been stopped, what would have been the result? Is there anyone here who believes that the United States would have made the strides that they have made? Or is it not a fact that since the Know-Nothing party was voted down and out, and because of the fact that the doors were kept open to worthy immigrants, the last fifty years have been the most prosperous and the most glorious period in the history of our country?

Mr. Chairman, I shall offer, when the proper time comes, the following substitute:

An examination, physical and other—

Meaning a mental as well as a physical examination.

Mr. WATSON. Why not say mental?

Mr. BARTHOLDT (reading):

An examination, physical and other, of every immigrant shall be made at the port of embarkation by the American consul at such port and by a medical officer designated by the Treasury Department for such purpose.

Mr. WACHTER. Why does not the gentleman include the word "mental" in describing the examination?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am willing to put that in.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. And you ought also to insert the word "moral."

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I am willing to accept the suggestions of these gentlemen and make the language of the amendment read:

An examination, physical, mental, and moral.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to read, in support of this substitute, an extract from a letter written by a gentleman who is now in the consular service of this country, and who now enforces, without authority of law, this very provision. Here is his language:

This is probably the only United States consulate where for some years there has been a consular inspection of emigrants. Let me tell you how this work is being done, with a view to encouraging an effort to have this system of inspection extended to all seaports whence emigrants leave for the United States. In the height of the season from three to four steamers of the North German Lloyd Steamship Company leave this port every week and each steamer requires from two to three inspections of the steerage passengers. At first all the bedding of these people is ordered into the disinfecting chamber, then each person is vaccinated and his or her physical condition carefully examined into, special care being taken to detect diseases of the eyes, skin, lungs, and mind, etc. The examination takes place in the presence of the United States consul or one of his assistants, and is in charge of Dr. Peltzer, a sworn medical officer of our Government, who is assisted by one or two physicians of the Lloyd Steamship Company.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri may continue his remarks for five minutes longer.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, he continues:

As soon as trachoma, lupus, pulmonary phthisis, and certain other diseases or any mental trouble is discovered the person so afflicted is rejected, and the consul regularly sends the list of all rejected emigrants to the Commissioner of Immigration at New York or Baltimore or Galveston, whither the steamer may be bound. At the same time the steamship company is also at once notified as to which passengers have been rejected at the consular inspection, whereupon they may, if they choose, investigate the cases more closely and determine for themselves whether or not they will risk taking such rejected passengers to the American port.

The system of consular inspection here at Bremen was introduced without any order from the State Department, but with its full sanction. If I am correctly informed, it was begun at the request of the Lloyd people themselves, who evidently were prompted by a humane desire to have the fate of unfortunate emigrants decided at the earliest possible moment, and also by their own business interests, for it undoubtedly has saved them considerable sums of money to have people retained on this side who probably would have been excluded by the Treasury officials at our ports of entry and deported at the expense of the steamship company. And, as is well known also to the Department, the North German Lloyd Steamship Company spare neither pains nor money to have the inspection done right, and they regularly reimburse this consulate for the salary paid the examining physician.

Now, this is without authority of law. What we want is to get the authority of law for a system of this kind and pay the medical officer out of our own pocket. My friend writes further:

The records at the various immigration bureaus will show, I believe, that the work done at this port by the present system of consular inspection of emigrants has been fairly successful. I know that among the deported steerage passengers there are but very few that have passed the consular inspection at Bremen. In looking over the lists of such deported aliens which are regularly sent me I rarely ever find a person returned to Bremen on account of some physical disability, etc.

Mr. WACHTER. The main thing is not having a sufficient amount of money, is it not?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I propose that this substitute be adopted in place of the educational test. After deliberately thinking the matter over; after months of consultation with people who know all about the question of immigration, and after a practical test such as is described in this private letter, I have come to the conclusion that if you examine the emigrant on the other side, before you allow him to come over to this side and run the risk of inhuman treatment by having to deport him, we will meet all the evils that are now being complained of with relation to immigration.

Mr. WACHTER. Will the gentleman permit a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes.

Mr. WACHTER. Does my friend not believe that if this educational test as proposed were adopted it would practically amount to an examination on the other side by the steamship owners? Would they not provide themselves with these cards, knowing that if they brought an undesirable person over here, one not admissible under the rule, that they would be compelled to take that person back? Would not they themselves make the examination on the other side in order to know that the person brought over here was admissible before bringing him?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Undoubtedly such would be the result, but I for one would prefer to have this system under the control and supervision of United States officers instead of leaving it to any steamship company or any of their agents.

Mr. WACHTER. The gentleman does not mean to do way with the examination on this side?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Not at all. The examination on this side will take place just the same.

Mr. WACHTER. And be of the same character as the examination on the other side?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I wish to merely suggest this to the gentleman: Does he not think that his foreign requirement or test would operate very seriously in excluding that German element who come to our country—young men who try to escape military duty? They come here for the purpose of escaping the military law, and if the test is put on them, as is proposed in your substitute, it would exclude that most worthy class. It would give notice of his purpose to come to the United States, and he would be stopped. That is what I mean.

Mr. LESSLER. They have an educational test at home. They can not get into the army without knowing how to read and write.

Mr. WACHTER. Oh, yes, they can.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. I am not so certain. I do not want to put any obstruction in the way of a young German coming to our country. They can stand the educational test.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I think the gentleman confuses my proposition with another proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may continue for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Missouri be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I want to say to my friend on the other side [Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama] that a suggestion has been made frequently in connection with the question of immigration, looking to the inauguration of a system of consular inspection—a general system of inspection to be applied by all our consuls on the other side. That would not be desirable, Mr. Chairman, for this reason, that no man could get a certificate from an American consul to allow him to emigrate to the United States who would be subject to military duty, because an American consul accredited to any European country would have to refuse such a permit to persons who were amenable to the laws of that country.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. That is what I think. I think that any notice that was required to be given on the other side by a consul will accomplish a thing that will not be desired in this respect, that it might exclude a number of young Germans who possibly can not read and write, who leave that country for the purpose of escaping military duty, and come to this country. That is what I mean.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I assure the gentleman that the adoption of my amendment will not militate against the coming here of any such desirable immigrants as those. The inspection under my system would be made by the consuls at the seaports only, and would not require the issue of certificates.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. It does not, then, go to the effect that any particular notice or publication would have to be given by the consul. I am opposed to having the test made at a foreign port. We must have the test made here at home.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Not at all.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama. If that test is to be given on the other side of the waters, I should object to it, for the reason that it would tend to exclude, in my opinion, a desirable element of German young men who very properly seek this country for the purpose of avoiding military duty, and ought to be allowed to come to our country. This country needs and demands a fair and reasonable immigration test and qualification. I shall support such a test and qualification.

Mr. WATSON. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Certainly.

Mr. WATSON. This amendment provides that there shall be a test, "physical and mental." What mental test?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That would be left to the discretion of the Treasury Department and the State Department, under whose control the consuls are operating.

Mr. WATSON. Would they have the right, under the provisions of your amendment, to offer an educational test?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I suppose a consul, in determining whether an immigrant is worthy to become an American citizen, would go into the question of his mental qualifications certainly, even if, as is suggested by the other amendment, he would not require him to read the Constitution of the United States, an instrument which even very few of us thoroughly understand.

Mr. SNODGRASS. I will state to the gentleman that I am in hearty sympathy with what he has said——

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I want to offer my substitute before my time expires.

Mr. SNODGRASS. What I wish to know is whether your amendment includes an examination as to moral qualification?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes; physical, mental, and moral.

Mr. SNODGRASS. That was the purpose of my amendment that I offered a while ago; but the gentleman has much better apprehended the scope of the evil to be avoided. I would ask him now if he has considered the cost of this medical examination?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I will say in reply to the gentleman that there are only five or six ports of embarkation in Europe. Consequently the expense would be very little, comparatively nothing.

Mr. CLARK. Really the expense under your system would not be as much as the expense under the present system.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Certainly not.

Mr. WACHTER. Is it provided that the present system of examination on this side is to be retained?

Mr. CLARK. Yes; but retaining it theoretically is not retaining it practically; and if Mr. BARTHOLDT's amendment is adopted, nine-tenths of the undesirable classe will not get on the ships to come to this country at all.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of my substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri sends to the Clerk's desk a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], with the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC], and the Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for amendment providing for an educational test the following: "An examination, physical, mental, and moral, of every immigrant shall be made at the port of embarkation by the American consul at such port and a medical officer designated by the Treasury Department for such purpose."

Mr. WACHTER. Would it not be proper to put the word "political" in there, in order to ascertain if they are anarchists?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. That is covered by another section.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. RAY of New York. Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], made by him yesterday in the discussion of this bill, left the impression that the American Revolution, which resulted in the establishment of this nation, was the outgrowth of the action of ignorant and illiterate men, and that the literate or educated men of the country were substantially a unit in opposing opposition to the British Crown.

Possibly that is not the idea the gentleman intended to convey, but his remarks made that impression upon my mind and upon the minds of others. He used the following language:

Now, looking over the history of my country, I do not find any justification for the theory that illiterate men have been especially harmful to the American Republic. Going back to the very dawn of our national existence, I find that the men who led the forces, the intellectual power that created the great organization of Tories in this country were all of them the very best educated men. I am going to point out now that no evil ever came to this country, no evil ever menaced this country from ignorant men, and, on the other hand, I affirm that such menace did come from the educated men.

Look at the teachings of the Tories of the Revolution, and I always look to those people with a kind of sympathy, for they were the "regulars" of that day and we were the "rebels." They were the "loyalists," as they always called themselves. But they do not stand very high in the estimation of the historian or of the American people. The leaders of that class were all of them educated in the New England colleges. Four men of one single family, who were the outspoken leaders of Toryism, were graduates of three of the New England colleges of that period, and the educated people of New England and New York and Pennsylvania and New Jersey were the leaders of the Tory party of that day.

I desire to combat, and do combat, most earnestly the general idea conveyed by the remarks quoted.

The leading Tories of Revolutionary times were not men of the highest education, although some of them were college graduates. In New England the ministers of the Episcopal Church were largely college graduates, and the Episcopal Church quite largely adhered to the Crown and opposed the Revolution. On the other hand, the members of the Congregational Church and the ministers of that denomination, and I include all churches except the Episcopal, almost uniformly espoused the cause of the Revolution. There had been much contention between the churches, and the Episcopal Church took sides with the Crown and against the colonies mainly because other churches opposed the Crown.

Who were the Tories? Says Ryerson in his work on The Loyalists of America and their Times, volume 1, page 505:

Many men of property and character in Massachusetts were in favor of England, partly from conviction and partly from fear. That large and often cultivated class called "conservatives," who hold by the past rather than hope for the future and are constitutionally timid, feared change; they were naturally Tories.

Ryerson defended the so-called Loyalists or Tories and was prejudiced in their favor, and nowhere does he claim or indicate that the Tories embraced the highly educated or even the highly educated classes of New England.

Says Hosmer in his life of Samuel Adams:

Though Boston lost before the Revolution the distinction of being the largest town in America, it remained the intellectual head of the country. Its common schools gave every child a good education, and Harvard College, scarcely out of sight and practically a Boston institution, gave a training hardly inferior to that of European universities of the day. * * * The churches were thronged on Sunday and at Thursday lecture as they have not been since. All classes were readers; the booksellers fill whole columns in the newspapers with their lists; the best books then in being in all departments of literature are on sale and in the circulating libraries. * * * Of course the folkmote of such a town as this would have spirit and interest. Wrote a Tory in those days (Saggittarius): "The town meeting at Boston is the hotbed of sedition. * * * Massachusetts was unquestionably the leader in the Revolution. * * * There is no way of determining how many New England militia took the field during the strife; the multitude was certainly vast. The figures, however, as regards the more regular levies have been preserved and are significant. With a population comprising scarcely more than one-third of the inhabitants of the thirteen colonies, New England furnished 118,251 of the 231,797 Continental troops that figured in the war. Massachusetts alone furnished 67,907, more than one-quarter of the entire number. * * * As Massachusetts led the thirteen colonies, the town of Boston led Massachusetts."

And Samuel Adams, a college graduate, led Boston. The leaders in the American Revolution against the British Crown, both those in civil life and those who won distinction in the Army fighting against Great Britain, were nearly all college graduates. I give a list of some of the more prominent, with the names of the colleges from which they graduated, and I include New York because the gentleman from Ohio in his remarks included New York with New England.

John Adams, graduate of Harvard; John Hancock, graduate of Harvard; Samuel Adams, graduate of Harvard; James Otis, graduate of Harvard; Joseph Warren, of Massachusetts, graduate of Harvard; Gen. Henry Knox, well educated; Gen. Artemas Ward, graduate of Harvard; Gen. Timothy Pickering, graduate of Harvard; Roger Sherman, of Connecticut, well educated; Gen. David Wooster, of Connecticut, graduate of Yale College;

Capt. Nathan Hale, of Connecticut, graduate of Yale; Alexander Hamilton, Kings College, New York, now Columbia (did not graduate); Robert R. Livingstone, Kings College; John Jay, Kings College; George Clinton, De Witt Clinton, graduate of Columbia College, of New York; Patrick Henry, not illiterate; Thomas Jefferson, College of William and Mary; James Madison, Princeton College; James Monroe, William and Mary College (did not graduate); George Washington, of Virginia; Gen. Nathaniel Greene, Rhode Island, highly educated; Gen. Thomas Mifflin, Pennsylvania, graduate of Philadelphia College.

It is true that in the years immediately succeeding the close of the Revolutionary war less attention was given to education throughout New England and the entire thirteen colonies than formerly. This grew out of the fact that the eight years' war had impoverished the country, and the people were neither able to support the common schools or send their children to college or give much, if any, attention to education. All their energies were bent to the restoration of material prosperity.

The opposition in New England to the war of 1812 was not due to the ignorance of her people, but to the exposure of her coasts to the ravages of British fleets and armies and to the crippling of her merchant marine and business interests.

No man can point to a single Tory who won distinction in the Revolutionary war fighting against the cause of the colonies who was a highly educated man. On the other hand, as the list shows, those who won the highest distinction in the Revolutionary war fighting for American independence and managing the civil affairs of the governments of the colonies were highly educated men and mainly college graduates.

Equally absurd is the claim of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ADAMS] that only the ignorant should or do perform ordinary manual labor.

What are we to say of Lincoln, the rail splitter; Garfield, the canal driver, and Grant, the farmer and tanner? These men studied and read beneath the stars or behind the chinks of log cabins, and despised not manual labor, and won their way to the very highest places among their fellow-citizens.

To-day in all the walks of life we find the boys who have not the advantages of school or college educating themselves, and they despise not manual labor, nor do they regard it as degrading. Toil in the ditch or behind the plow, if it be necessary to earn an honest living, is no disgrace to any man, whether he be ignorant or educated. In the South to-day, where factories are springing up, the owners open schools and give the children and young men and women an opportunity to gain education, because educated labor is the more desirable and the more valuable.

I repudiate the idea that education lifts a man above honest manual labor or that honest manual labor degrades the educated man. Perish the thought that we must keep men in ignorance if we would have workers in wood and toilers in the field and mechanics in the workshops, or import ignorant labor if we would have our ditches dug, our crops planted, and our factories kept in operation.

We have not forgotten the learned blacksmith nor the hewer of stone who in old Scotland revolutionized the science of geology. Hugh Miller, with more learning than many a king, thought it no disgrace to fashion and place the stone as a common mason.

No more dangerous doctrine can be taught in this Republic than that which implies that the educated young man is above placing his hand to the plow or fashioning the machinery that moves the world. If anything makes a nation great and free and independent it is educated labor—men and women who are self-reliant because intelligent and well educated, who are willing and able to work with both hands and mind when occasion arises. That man is successful in life who, knowing how, is willing and not ashamed to do any work that ought to be done. The man who knows the qualities of iron and steel takes delight in fashioning them into useful implements, while the ignorant man beats into shape because it brings him bread. While doing his work the ignorant man is discontented and surly because his mind is indolent and unfed and unthinking. He wonders why others who work by his side are cheerful and contented. He does not appreciate that the difference comes from the broader views given the one above the other by reason of education and an understanding of the results to be accomplished and the good to come from the labor performed.

I insist that the prominence of our institutions of free government depends not on our wealth, but on the intelligence of the educated masses, and that if we would escape revolution we must see to it that our common-school system is perpetuated and extended and that well-educated men and women fill every department of life, high and low, and take pride in pursuing any and every avocation necessary to the existence and growth and development of a prosperous people and nation.

I have always believed and I still believe that our patriot fathers who fought at Lexington and Concord and Bunker Hill; at Bennington and Saratoga; at Trenton, Princeton, King's Mountain and Yorktown, were intelligent and as well educated as the times would permit. I am of the opinion that the more education a man has the more he loves and longs for and appreciates liberty and good government—republican government—the more he desires to have a hand in governmental affairs.

Absolute monarchies exist because of the ignorance of the people. With the growth and spread of education has departed the glory of the throne and crown and scepter. Educated people repudiate the doctrine of the divine right of kings and teach the divine right of men to organize and govern themselves, in accordance with the intelligent popular will.

Educated men understand and respect law and good government. Ignorance bows to force because it fears, but neither understands nor appreciates the government under which it exists.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] by no means meets the object that will be accomplished by the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. The one will not lessen immigration and the other will.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] said much about the quality of the immigrants that have come into this country, and of course we are all immigrants or the descendants of them. But I want to say to the committee that the most important question is not about the quality, but about the quantity, of the immigrants that are coming into this country.

We have had before us, in reference to various measures, remonstrances and delegations from trades unions that represent the great mass of wage-workers in this country, and I say, Mr. Chairman, that this measure that we are voting on now is of more importance to the wage-earners of this country than all the other bills that will be passed at this session a hundredfold over.

The one thing of greatest importance in the future development of this country, for its prosperity, and even for its safety and preservation, is that the great mass of the people should receive sufficient wages to maintain a reasonable standard of comfort and orderly living. It is not a question of quantity in the number of our people, but of quality; it is not how many millions of population shall we have, but what sort of a population shall it be.

No man can deny that the question of wages has got to be decided by the law of supply and demand. Why did we vote almost unanimously for the Chinese-exclusion bill? Because every man said and every man believed that to bring in possibly five or ten million Chinese immigrants would sooner or later reduce the price of wages in this country. Is there anyone who believes that this great body of five or six hundred thousand immigrants can continue to come in yearly without reducing the average price paid to wage-earners as soon as bad times come, and come they will, necessarily. And if there shall be in this country, whose Government rests upon universal suffrage, large masses of men who are not paid sufficient sums to satisfy their needs and to enable them to maintain their present condition of comfort, discontented, half paid, and half employed—is there any man in this committee who does not believe we shall have social troubles far more dangerous than those which arose from the existence of slavery fifty years ago? The advantage of the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] is that it will, to a very considerable extent, lessen the body of immigration coming into the country by excluding those who can not read.

It is idle to say, no matter what the condition of prosperity may be, that any employer of labor pays more than he must pay. I do not care how much any man is making, he does not pay the wage-earner $2 a day if any other man turns up who is willing to accept a dollar a day. If you have more laborers than labor, prices for work will go down and no one can help it. The theory on which protection is based is that it keeps up the price of wages, and that the salvation, safety, and prosperity of the country depends upon a reasonably high standard of wages and of general comfort and well-being.

Now, Mr. Chairman, does anyone believe that you can permanently keep up a high scale of wages by keeping out the product of pauper labor and letting in the pauper laborer himself? My friend from Missouri said that this country should be the asylum of the distressed of all nations. A great immigration was beneficial when we had 3,000,000 people in this country and untold millions of acres of vacant land. Now we have 80,000,000 people and the land still vacant is arid.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Do not the provisions of this bill prevent the immigration of paupers?

Mr. PERKINS. The term pauper labor is figurative. It means the men who work for a price materially less than the workingmen of this country are willing to take, or ought to be asked to take.

Now, what we should consider, Mr. Chairman, is not the distress of other nations, but to do the most we can to avert distress in this nation. There is a natural increase with 80,000,000 of population of over 500,000 every year, and unless we see to it that those children that every day are coming into the world, American born, who will be American bred, shall have the facilities for comfort that their parents had, unless we see to that we will leave behind us a bad heritage. We must see to it for their sake and for our own sake. Their prosperity and the national safety are linked together.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in regard to the general features of this bill, I approve it. I believe it is a good bill. I believe that the chairman of the committee is entitled to the thanks of this House for the perseverance with which he has labored to prepare it and get it before us. I approve of the bill, however, because of its prohibitory features; because it restricts immigration; and I am not averse to amending it and making it better by still further prohibition.

I want to say to the gentleman from Missouri that he is mistaken in the opinion he expressed about "the gentleman from Iowa" being a Know-nothing. I lived in the days of Know-nothingism. I was opposed to all of the ideas of that party at that time. The questions that were presented then are not the questions of to-day. At that time, as the gentleman from New York has said, there were thousands and tens of thousands of square miles of prairie inviting the settler. We wanted immigration; and I am opposed to immigration now in part because there are no more lands; because immigration congests itself in the cities; because the people that come often are disappointed and are not benefited.

I do not object to immigration simply because of the degenerating effects upon our population. After a little time that difficulty is effaced. But I am opposed to it, among other things, because it is harmful, as I believe, to the very best interests of the United States and the very perpetuity of the United States. What sacrifices do we make in order to enlarge the labor field of the people of the United States? Every Republican who votes for a tariff proposition does it for what reason? Not simply that it will benefit us for a moment in extending, possibly, our commerce and give us a home market, but to enlarge the labor field and make more places where Americans can work, to raise the wage and keep it up to its standard. That is why we make these sacrifices, and that is what I think to-day is the great labor of statesmanship for the American people—to see to it that the labor field of the United States furnishes a place where every laborer may work and receive a fixed wage for his day's work.

As long as that can be done there will be contentment in our homes; as long as that can be done that contentment gives permanency, perpetuity, to our institutions. No man seeks a change who is prosperous under present conditions; and therefore I am unwilling to jeopardize that labor field that we have built up and extended at so great a cost to ourselves by flooding it with irresponsible people that we have no interest in. Every one of these 250,000 laborers that have come into the United States this year, and the number will be larger than that, is here to seek the place of some American laborer, to seek a place in this labor field even now too restricted. I do not want to subject our own people to this competition.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman permit me an interruption?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, if it is a question.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. If the argument of the gentleman is true, then would he not be willing to propose a bill to shut the doors of the Republic against all immigration?

Mr. HEPBURN. That is impractical—that would disrupt the pleasant relations that exist between ours and other nations. But I want to approach to that point as rapidly and as completely as we can. I do not want to be offensive to other nations—I do not want to excite reprisals in other directions on the part of other nations, but I do want to keep this labor field of America for Americans. [Applause.] That is the reason why I want to keep these people out.

We could do it if it was not for the congested condition of the cities. The gentleman from Missouri has a large German population in his city, and for some reason or other these gentlemen want their associates—their old friends—to share with them the blessings that they have. Another gentleman has an immense Polish population in his city, and he wants to conciliate their kindly feelings or secure them by letting their friends and their relatives come in and share with them.

Now, I think we ought to take a broader view than that; we ought to look at the situation as it is, as it affects the whole country and as it affects this labor field of ours, because that is the one thing that the Democrats and Republicans alike ought to look to. I can see a gradual change in the opinions of very many gentlemen on the other side of this House. The importance of the labor field and the necessity for preserving it for our own people has impressed itself on them.

Mr. STORM. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes, if it is a question.

Mr. STORM. As I understand, a laborer is different from a mechanic. A mechanic comes here and is educated and can read and write, but laborers we do not raise in this country; we do not raise American laborers, as I understand it, nor American domestic servants, and, therefore, the remarks of the gentleman that they come in competition with ours does not apply.

Mr. HEPBURN. Oh, I think that is a distinction too refined for the comprehension of anybody except from the gentleman's own locality. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. IRWIN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Iowa be extended five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HEPBURN. I will occupy it to answer the question of the gentleman.

Mr. MANN. I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether, in his opinion, the turning out of the noneducated laborers would affect the field of labor where there is a great surplus of labor as much as it would the farm laborers, and whether there is a great surplus in that direction now?

Mr. HEPBURN. No man that comes to this country or that ought to come to this country comes here with the expectation of always being a laborer. While that may be his vocation when he comes, if he is such a one as is fit to come, he aspires to other places speedily, to fitting himself for competition with the higher classes.

Mr. MANN. If that is true, it would have the effect to restrict immigration.

Mr. HEPBURN. If it does that, it pleases me. I was going to say that the gentleman from Illinois did not vote against it before, but I believe he was not here.

Mr. MANN. Oh, the gentleman is mistaken. I was here and voted against it before. I know I did on one or two occasions, at least.

Mr. HEPBURN. That may be, but the RECORD I had before me did not show that.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

Mr. HEPBURN. Very well.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. The question may seem academical, but it is in the light of history very real indeed. Is it or not true that every immigrant who comes here is not only a producer, but also a consumer; and that, in the language of one whom I consider the greatest Speaker the House of Representatives ever had, Mr. Thomas B. Reed, "every immigrant practically brings his job with him?"

Mr. HEPBURN. And he does not take some other man's job?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. He does not.

Mr. HEPBURN. I supposed he did.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. He does not, and he furnishes a job for somebody else. In that light, if the gentleman looks at it he will see it with entirely different eyes from what he does now.

Mr. HEPBURN. Does the gentleman refer to that as a question? [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I asked if he is not a consumer.

Mr. HEPBURN. Right here I want to call attention to that portion of the veto message of a President which the gentleman did not name, and as a comment upon that I want to call attention to the fact that this House by a vote of 195 to 37 registered their disagreement with the opinion that the gentleman quoted with so much confidence.

Mr. SHATTUC. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SHATTUC. That measure to which you now refer as having received so large a vote—is that now a law?

Mr. HEPBURN. Probably not.

Mr. SHATTUC. What became of it?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not remember now. I think it was lost in the Senate.

Mr. WATSON. It failed in the Senate.

Mr. HEPBURN. But it passed the House originally by a vote of 217 to 36.

Mr. SHATTUC. The contention that I now make with the gentleman from Iowa is that this bill, if you tack this amendment on it, will meet the same fate exactly as that did.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think not; I hope not. If I thought that was true I would not vote for it.

Mr. SHATTUC. I am trying to persuade you that it is true.

If you gentlemen would only wait and let your committee bring in its bill, constructed on proper lines, I guarantee that the House will pass this bill and that one too; and that will be a great improvement on your amendment. That is my argument.

Mr. GROW. Mr. Chairman, in reference to immigration into this country the great question as to the welfare of the country is as to the character of the immigrant. Whatever test of character may be applied, the desirability of the immigrant as a citizen of the United States is the all-important question.

Is education—the ability to read and write—any test of real character? I know some people who can read a good many languages, yet who in what we call common sense and wisdom are great fools. To exclude from this country a class of immigration that would depreciate the quality of our civilization is proper. For that reason we exclude the Chinese. The Chinese people in character and in all the elements that go to make up good society as we understand it, would not be a desirable part of our population. Hence Congress has by law excluded that class of foreign people.

I am in favor of Asia for the Asiatics, for the reason that the Almighty, in His providence, has placed different races on different portions of the earth. Paul, on Mars Hill, said to the Athenians that God "hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth, and hath determined the times before appointed and the bounds of their habitation."

Asiatic civilization is peculiar. The Asiatic people have characteristics that it will take long generations to change so as to adapt them to our civilization. Hence there is a propriety in their exclusion. But the races that can be assimilated with our population and become a part of the society in which we live, whose characteristics make them desirable citizens, why should they be excluded on a mere educational test? Our Republic stands, the great beacon light on the shores of time, beckoning all the races of men on to a higher and more glorious destiny.

Why should we exclude them from a home on our shores when they are in all the elements of character fitted to become a part of the great elements of our strength and of our wealth—pioneers in the wilderness in time of peace and soldiers in time of war—ready when the rights or welfare of their adopted country are at stake to peril their lives, the same as the native born? Education has nothing to do with the great elements of character. The man surrounded by his family at his humble fireside is growing up in American society, under the influence of American schools, and his offspring in the first or second generation can not be distinguished from native-born Americans.

Why exclude that class of people, whose only defect is their condition in life, made so under the governments under which they were born? Why shut them out? Why deprive them of the opportunity of working out a better and a higher destiny for themselves and their children when they can not injure our civilization, but are calculated to aid like other citizens in advancing it?

A test applied to the human brain that would determine its intelligence, if there was such a test, might be desirable. But there is no yardstick or scales that can determine the question of a man's common sense, his honesty, his integrity, his frugality. A man who possesses these qualifications is a good citizen, though he may not be able to write his name or to read a word of the Constitution. If he is law-abiding, peaceable, ready to discharge the duties of a citizen, why should he be excluded from our shores?

Our fathers all came from abroad. They sought this New World, bequeathed by Columbus to mankind, and why exclude the unfortunate portion of the race, guilty of no crime and possessed of the same elements—energy, enterprise, and frugality—as the best of their fellow-citizens, who in their adopted country become as patriotic as any others?

Why, then, apply any test except that which may be applied as tests of character, not of acquisitions of learning? Make the qualification for voting what you please, but let there be no qualification which will exclude a man of good character and morals from the opportunity to earn his livelihood with his own right arm under God Almighty's sunshine on the face of any portion of God's earth. [Loud applause.]

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I now ask unanimous consent that the debate on the pending amendment and the amendment thereto close in ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] asks that debate on the amendment presented by him and on the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio and the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri close in ten minutes.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman make that twenty minutes, so that I may have ten minutes?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I will suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that we agree to twenty minutes, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman in charge of the bill and one-half by myself.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama amends his request and asks that debate on the amendment and the substitute be closed in twenty minutes, one-half of the time to be controlled by himself and the other half by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. HILL. I shall not object to this request, but I shall object to any extension of time after this on any portion of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York objects.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on the pending section and amendment thereto be closed in twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama moves that debate on the two amendments and the substitute be closed in twenty minutes.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the adoption of that motion bar additional amendment to this section?

The CHAIRMAN. Any additional amendments may be offered, but debate on the section and all amendments thereto will be closed.

Mr. CORLISS. Then I submit I should object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Michigan that ample opportunity will be given to all members of the committee to offer amendments.

Mr. CORLISS. I would like to ask if that motion would debar debate on my amendment which I propose to offer and which has no relevancy to the question under discussion?

The CHAIRMAN. The motion was to close debate on the section and all amendments.

Mr. CORLISS. I propose to offer an amendment to an entirely different section on a different subject, which will be in the nature of an additional section to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. I will state to the gentleman from Michigan that this motion would not affect debate on his proposed amendment. The motion of the gentleman from Alabama does not relate to any other than the question included in his motion. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to close debate on the amendment and the substitute in twenty minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, as there was no division of time, I ask recognition, and I yield ten minutes of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC].

Mr. SHATTUC. Where did you get ten minutes?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, there was no division of time, and I ask recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Alabama that we are still under the five-minute rule. His motion did not take it out of the five-minute rule. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Alabama for five minutes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I wish to state my objections to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT]. I did not intend to address the committee further, but I wish to state this: that the gentleman has offered a substitute to the educational test proposed by me, a provision that all immigrants who come to this country must stand a mental test, a physical test, and a moral test by the consular service of the United States. Now, if you are opposed to an educational test, why should you be in favor of this test, because you leave it entirely to the Department to determine what the test would be, and it would probably be along the same lines?

Why should you accept this other test and put the Government to the expense of appointing the consuls to do this work, appointing the examining physicians to do this work, requiring them to go to the consular officer and get their certificate, and as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. RICHARDSON], my colleague, said, if that is the case, if they are required to go to a consular office, that consular office could not give a certificate without violating the comity between this country and other countries to a young man running away from there in violation of the military laws or any other laws, regardless of this test; but if you accept the amendment that I offer, the emigrant does not have to go to any consular office; he does not have to stand an educational test until he comes here to make a living. He may leave there because he does not want to serve in the army, but when he comes here there is no question raised if he can pass the educational test; he is admitted.

No one of them would be brought over here unless he was qualified, and why? Because the amendment provides that the steamship company must carry the emigrant back who can not pass the test. Therefore, the steamship companies, in order to protect themselves, will apply the test to them before they start; not because of their regard for our law, but as a protection to themselves, so that they will not have to carry the immigrants back at their own expense.

As far as the Germans are concerned, I believe my friend stated yesterday that only about 2 per cent or 2½ per cent of the people of that nationality are illiterate. The figures I had showed a little more than that; but of the German immigrants coming to this country it would only exclude about 2 or 3 out of every 100, whereas it would exclude 43 or 45 per cent of the undesirable classes.

Now, I say, in reference to this amendment, the question simply is whether you are going to stand for home and country, or whether you are going to stand as a matter of sentiment for the indiscriminate, uneducated classes of Europe. You may give your sympathy and your sentiment to those poor unfortunate people, but are you going to bring them here to uplift them at the expense of your own people? I say that this proposition is to uplift the American wage-earner, to hold up the standard of American living, to hold up the American standard of civilization, and no self-respecting voter in this country will ever reprove a man who stands here and votes to uphold the American standard in that respect.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, a great many members of the committee have asked me how the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization stand on this amendment. I have no doubt there are several members of the committee who agree with my friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] as to the merits of the amendment that he has introduced. The difference of opinion begins right here. They want to see some legislation pass this House that will become a law. They want to do something that will amount to something. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] professes great regard for the American workingman, but he is pursuing such a policy that it will do the American workingman no good at all, but will do him harm instead, because the measure that the gentleman advocates will not become a law, and he will also defeat the bill on which the committee have worked so hard to perfect it and get it before the House for action.

Now, what you ought to do is to reject this educational test as an amendment to this bill. Set it aside; pass this bill that has been so favorably spoken of by my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. No man in this House understands the value of it better than does the gentleman from Iowa, because he was for a long time the Solicitor-general of the Treasury Department, and it is admitted by everyone that he was the best one the Government ever had, and he is familiar with this subject, and he speaks advisedly when he says it is an excellent bill. Now, I say to you gentlemen in good faith that if you follow the lead of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] and of the distinguished lawyer from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] and attach this amendment to this bill, you may pride yourselves that you have accomplished a great result; but I ask you to watch and see if this bill does not go into a pigeonhole in the Senate, never to be heard of again.

On the other hand, reject this educational test, report this bill favorably to the House, let the House pass a properly constructed, legal bill, one that the Supreme Court of the United States will uphold, and we will send such a bill to the Senate as will receive favorable action there. If the House will do this, I pledge you that my committee, because I have just this moment consulted with the members of it, will report to this House within ten days a bill on the subject of the educational test, drawn on proper lines, in a way that will give no offense to other nations, and that will reach that class of people whom we want to reach. Now, I ask you in good faith to vote against this amendment. Vote against both of them; but if you must vote for either one of them, vote for the one introduced by the gentleman, my friend from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that this amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri was offered as a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], because the two amendments are not in conflict, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri might just as well have been offered as an independent section; so that the friends of the educational qualification might have voted for his amendment, because I think it will serve a good purpose. It is to provide for an inspection and examination of those immigrants in order to determine, in advance of their landing on our shores, as to whether or not they would be qualified for citizenship when they come here. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama is to attach an educational restriction or qualification. For that reason I shall have to vote against the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri, because it is offered as a substitute for the proposition of the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there are ten minutes remaining of the time allowed for debate on this section.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, in answer to what my genial friend from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] has said, I want to read the Republican platform of 1896.

> For the protection of the quality of our American citizenship and of the wages of our workingmen against the fatal competition of low-priced labor, we demand that the immigration laws be thoroughly enforced and so extended as to exclude from entrance to the United States those who can neither read nor write.

That is a specific indorsement of the pending proposition. And in 1900 the Republican national platform contained this clause:

> In the further interest of American labor we favor a more effective restriction of cheap labor from foreign lands.

Mr. SHATTUC. We have that.

Mr. WATSON. Who is disputing that?

Mr. SHATTUC. Nobody.

Mr. WATSON. Then, in further answer to my friend, I will state that in the Fifty-fourth Congress this very proposition passed the House, passed the Senate, and went to the President of the United States, but he vetoed it, and the House then passed it by a two-thirds vote over his head, and it went to the Senate where it failed of the required vote.

Subsequently, when Senator LODGE was chairman of the Senate Committee on Immigration, this very proposition was presented and passed. Subsequently, when Senator FAIRBANKS, from my own State, was chairman of the Committee on Immigration of the Senate, this very proposition was presented to that body and passed. Now, what right has the gentleman from Ohio to assume, when this measure has passed the Senate once when it was Democratic and twice when it was Republican, that the proposition as now stated would not pass the United States Senate?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. WATSON. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. It is not the same proposition, if I may so state to the gentleman. The bill that passed the House and was vetoed by President Cleveland was afterwards passed over the veto of President Cleveland by this House and failed finally in the Senate, was a bill which only applied to male immigrants. It excluded females, and it contained a number of other modifications which, in my judgment, are absolutely necessary to perfect legislation of this kind. It was not to strike down the proposition which is now submitted.

Mr. WATSON. The bill was practically the educational qualification as provided in this bill, because when I drew the bill I went back to the original Lodge bill, as presented in the Fifty-fourth Congress, and took almost identically the same language; and my friend from Missouri was on the committee at the time the bill was reported.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I was chairman of the committee.

Mr. WATSON. Was chairman of the committee.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. And I reported it by instructions of the committee.

Mr. WATSON. I did not know how that was; but I know the gentleman reported the bill, and I believe in the passage of the bill and voted for it, but refused to pass it over the President's veto, if I remember correctly. However that may be, I am in favor of the qualification as provided in this proposition, because it accomplishes what ought to be accomplished. And in answer to my friend, the distinguished and venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania, permit me to say we do not exclude any great number of Germans. It will exclude but a small number of Swedes and Norwegians and English and Scotch and Irish and Welsh, but it will have the result of excluding great hordes of Italians and Huns who come in year after year, undermining the very principles of this Republic and interfering with labor all over this country. Labor everywhere is in favor of this. I have a letter from Samuel Gompers, who is president of the American Federation of Labor, that has just reached me, and I will send it to the Clerk's desk and ask to have it read in my time as the conclusion of my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Several MEMBERS. Ask unanimous consent to have it read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to have the letter read.

Mr. WATSON. I understand my friend from Connecticut said that he would not agree to any unanimous consents, and I do not care to run against any Connecticut snags.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent that the letter may be printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the letter may be printed as a part of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. ADAMS. I object.

Mr. SULZER. I ask unanimous consent to have the letter read.

Mr. ADAMS. The gentleman from Connecticut said that he would not grant any more unanimous consents. Why should he, therefore, be entitled to the courtesy?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that it may be read. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Well, Mr. Chairman, the time has been limited already to twenty minutes. It will take about five minutes to read the letter. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Missouri be allowed five minutes after the reading of the letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that there are five minutes of the twenty minutes of limitation still remaining. The Chair is of the opinion that the unanimous consent will not take away the time given for debate. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York? [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection, and the Clerk will read the letter.

The letter was read, as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., May 16, 1902.

Hon. JAMES E. WATSON,
House of Representatives.

DEAR SIR: I have observed with much pleasure your activity in the cause of the regulation of immigration, and in particular your introduction of a bill providing that no adult immigrant shall be admitted to our country till he has acquired the first rudiments of education. It is for this reason that I now address you with regard to pending and prospective legislation.

The organized workers of the country feel that the existing immigration laws, while not without their value, are of trifling effect compared with the needs and the just demands of American labor.

The elaborate bill reported to the House by the Committee on Immigration is for the most part a simple codification of the existing laws, and modifies them only in some few details. I believe that the changes proposed are for the most part desirable. They are, however, comparatively unimportant. If it is worth while to take up the question of immigration at all, it is worth while to introduce a genuine and effective regulation.

The strength of this country is in the intelligence and prosperity of our working people. But both the intelligence and the prosperity of our working people are endangered by the present immigration. Cheap labor, ignorant labor, takes our jobs and cuts our wages.

The fittest survive; that is, those that fit the conditions best. But it is the economically weak, not the economically strong, that fit the conditions of the labor market. They fit best because they can be got to work cheapest. Women and children drive out men, unless either law or labor organization stops it. In just the same way the Chinaman and others drive out the American, the German, the Irishman.

The tariff keeps out cheap foreign goods. It is employers, not workingmen, that have goods to sell. Workingmen sell labor, and cheap labor is not kept out by the tariff. The protection that would directly help the workers is protection against the cheap labor itself.

The Nashville convention of the American Federation of Labor, by a vote of 1,858 to 352, pronounced in favor of an educational test for immigrants. Such a measure would check immigration in a moderate degree, and those who would be kept out by it are those whose competition in the labor market is most injurious to American workers. No other measure which would have any important effect of this kind is seriously proposed.

The need of regulation may be less sharply felt at the present time, when there are less men out of work than there were a few years ago. But the flood of cheap labor is increasing, and its effect at the slightest stagnation in industry or in any crisis will be fearful to the American workmen.

A fall in wages or a relative fall of wages makes the workers unable to buy as large a share as before of the goods they produce. This hastens the time when overproduction or underconsumption will show itself. That means hard times; and when hard times come the mass of immigrants that prosperity attracted will be here to increase the burden of unemployment.

For these reasons the American Federation of Labor believes that the present opportunity ought not to be allowed to pass without the adoption of an effective measure for the protection of American labor.

I earnestly hope that you will be able to procure the embodiment of an illiteracy test for immigrants in the bill (H. R. 12199) which the House now has under consideration.

I have the honor to remain, yours, very respectfully,

SAM. J. GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I merely desire to give expression to one thought in answer to the argument of my distinguished friend from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. The difference between the substitute offered by myself and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama is that my substitute tends to relieve the American people and this country from the stigma and the meaning of the word "deportation." That is a word not contained in the lexicon of American history, a word not employed as yet by any American statesman whose lessons we care to obey and follow, a word comparatively new in the politics of this country. If you adopt my substitute the undesirable immigrant will be barred upon the other side. If you adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama he will come across the ocean, and the American people will stand charged in the face of the civilized world with attempting to brand for life, and send back to his old home, a man merely because he is unable to read, because perhaps he has not had the opportunity of acquiring that knowledge.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SULZER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. To which gentleman does the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. "How happy I would be with either if the other dear charmer was away." [Laughter.] I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. ADAMS. Perhaps we are both to ask the same question. I should like to ask whether the gentleman from Missouri has looked into the question of how the foreign governments would regard the provision that our consuls were to pass on the qualifications of their people?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I have, and there is absolutely no objection on the part of any government on the face of the earth, because the same practice is now in vogue in several ports of embarkation without the authority of law. I want to give that practice the authority of American law. And I will say that while the examination will take place practically upon foreign soil, it will really take place within the jurisdiction of the American consul. As soon as the American consul begins the examination and inspection of the immigrant, from that moment the immigrant is practically within the scope of our jurisdiction. Now I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. SULZER. On page 10 of the pending bill, line 11, in italics, it provides that the officer at the ports of arrival shall make the examination, and the present law provides for an examination to be made at the place of embarkation. If the present law were incorporated into this, will the gentleman state how an immigrant entitled to admission to this country could be returned?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, I regret to say that my friend from New York has misunderstood the remarks which I have submitted. It is not the fact that the present law provides for any inspection and examination on the other side of the ocean. Not at all. It is only a practice which has been tried in several ports of embarkation and has worked very satisfactorily, so much so that no immigrant who has come to this country has been rejected on this side, because he has already passed a rigid examination on the other side.

Mr. SULZER. Does not the gentleman think that the examination ought to be made at the place of arrival as well as at the place of embarkation?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. My substitute does not exclude an examination on this side at all.

Mr. SULZER. It only provides for an examination at the place of embarkation?

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired, debate on the amendment is exhausted, and the Chair will state the present parliamentary situation.

There is pending an amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama inserting a new section in the bill after section 2, on page 4. To the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama the gentleman from Ohio, chairman of the Committee on Immigration, has submitted an amendment. The gentleman from Missouri has offered a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama. The question, therefore, will first be upon the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio. When this amendment is disposed of, whether adopted or rejected, the question will recur on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SMITH of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again read the amendment.

The question was considered; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WACHTER) there were 54 ayes and 13 noes.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I want to offer to the pending amendment which I think will take the precedence of the substitute.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HILL having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 989. An act to authorize the Light-House Board to pay to Chamblin, Delaney & Scott the sum of $1,704.46.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

H. R. 14018. An act to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes.

IMMIGRATION.

The committee resumed its session.

The amendment proposed by Mr. LITTLE was read, as follows:

In the amendment of Mr. UNDERWOOD strike out "eighteen" and insert "twenty;" so as to read "under twenty years of age."

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the substitute of the gentleman from Missouri as an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests to the gentleman from Iowa that the vote now about to be taken——

Mr. LACEY. I offer as an amendment the same language which the gentleman from Missouri has offered as a substitute. If the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri be adopted as a substitute, of course the original goes out.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I submit that the amendment has already been perfected by the adoption of the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio——

Mr. LACEY. It has not been perfected.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. And the vote now recurs on the substitute offered by myself, which can not now be offered as an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama is still before the House, subject to perfection by amendment. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. LACEY. I offer it in the same language as the substitute of the gentleman from Missouri, but as an amendment, not as a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that he offer his amendment in writing as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. LACEY. Very well. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama by adding the following at the end thereof:

An examination, etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that there is now pending before the House the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. LACEY. And I offer an amendment to that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri has offered a substitute to that amendment; and the Chair suggests that the gentleman from Iowa can not in the way he proposes appropriate the paper pending as a part of the files of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. LACEY. I do not understand that there is any patent on it. The proposition is now offered in the nature of an amendment. This is a different proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands the rule, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa should be reduced to writing and offered by him as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. LACEY. That point was not made. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I call for a vote on the substitute.

Mr. LITTLE. As an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama, I move the language which I send to the desk, to come in at the end of that amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That the educational examination herein provided for may be made by the consul of the United States at the port of embarkation, under such rules and regulations as shall be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

The CHAIRMAN (having put the question). The ayes appear to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask for a division.

The question being again taken, there were—ayes 43, noes 53.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] is rejected. The question is now on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri, unless the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] has his amendment ready to offer.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. LITTLE] offered the same thing substantially.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is then on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Missouri for the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. SULZER. I ask that the substitute be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute for the amendment of Mr. UNDERWOOD providing for an educational test the following:

"An examination, physical, mental, and moral, of every immigrant shall be made at the port of embarkation by the American consul at such port and by a medical officer designated by the Treasury Department for such purpose."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The regular order.

The CHAIRMAN (having put the question on the substitute of Mr. BARTHOLDT). The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I call for a division.

Mr. ADAMS. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If this substitute is adopted, does that pass it finally?

The CHAIRMAN. If the substitute be adopted, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama falls.

The question being again taken on the substitute of Mr. BARTHOLDT, there were ayes 34, noes 75.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Chairman, is it in order now to offer the substitute of the gentleman from Missouri as an independent section?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that until this section is disposed of an independent section can not be taken up.

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be in order at the present time. This section is now being perfected, and the vote recurs on the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I call for a vote, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Then I desire to offer it after the section is disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes seem to have it.

Mr. SHATTUC. I call for a division, Mr. Chairman.

The House divided.

The CHAIRMAN. Eighty-six gentlemen vote in the affirmative.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my demand.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio withdraws his demand for a division.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I renew the demand.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois renews the demand for a division. Those opposed will rise and remain standing until counted.

The division was completed.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the ayes are 86 and the noes are 7, so the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Chairman, I now offer the substitute of the gentleman from Missouri as an independent section.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to the present section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas that this present section, section 3, has been agreed to. No other amendments to that section are now in order.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand it is not completed until all amendments are disposed of.

The CHAIRMAN. All amendments and the substitute and the new section offered by the gentleman from Alabama have been disposed of.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I had an amendment to the first part of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. All sections have been disposed of. The gentleman from Tennessee offers as a separate section the substitute of the gentleman from Missouri, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. An examination, physical, mental, and moral, of every immigrant shall be made at the port of embarkation by the American consul at such port and a medical officer designated by the Treasury Department for such purpose.

Mr. SNODGRASS. Mr. Chairman, the effect of that amendment is to add an additional moral qualification, which is not provided for in this bill, I think. It also operates for the convenience of the emigrant, and as it can be carried out with very little additional expense, I think it ought to be adopted as an independent section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee, which is a new section, as section 4 of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GLENN) there were—ayes 33, noes 41.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Chairman, when section 2 was passed unanimous consent was given to recur to that section for the purpose of offering the amendment which I now send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of section 2, page 4, add the following:

"Provided that such persons are not within other excluded classes in this section specified."

Mr. RUCKER. That amendment will perfect that section.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to that section for the purpose of offering the following amendment, which I will ask to have read.

The clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of line 7, page 3, the words "and habitual drunkards."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to return to section 2 of the bill for the purpose of offering the amendment which the clerk has read. Is there objection?

Mr. SHATTUC. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio objects. The Chair will state that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama is a new section, known as section 3. The Clerk will now proceed to read section 3 of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the importation into the United States of any woman for the purposes of prostitution is hereby forbidden; and whoever shall knowingly and willfully import or attempt to import any woman into the United States for the purposes of prostitution, or shall knowingly or willfully hold or attempt to hold any woman for such purposes in pursuance of such illegal importation or contract or agreement, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and, on conviction thereof, shall be imprisoned not less than one nor more than five years and pay a fine not exceeding $5,000.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, to come in as two independent sections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend between lines 24 and 25, page 4, by adding two sections, as follows:

"SEC. 4. That it shall hereafter be unlawful for any male alien who has not in good faith made his declaration before the proper court of his intention to become a citizen of the United States to be employed on any public works of the United States, or to come regularly or habitually into the United States by land or water for the purpose of engaging in any mechanical trade or manual labor, for wages or salary, returning from time to time to a foreign country.

"SEC. 5. That it shall be unlawful for any person, partnership, company, or corporation knowingly to employ any alien coming into the United States in violation of the next preceding section of this act: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to the employment of sailors, deck hands, or other employees of vessels, or railroad train hands, such as conductors, engineers, brakemen, firemen, or baggagemen, whose duties require them to pass over the frontier to reach the termini of their runs, or to boatmen or guides on the lakes and rivers on the northern border of the United States, or citizens of countries in North America."

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. CORLISS. Mr. Chairman, that amendment, with the exception of the last three or four words——

Mr. MANN. I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio, chairman of the Committee on Immigration, has already reserved a point of order.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I want to make a parliamentary inquiry. What is the parliamentary situation? If I understand it, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SNODGRASS] offered an additional section. Now, the gentleman from Michigan offers two additional sections. His amendment is not an amendment to the one offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee was a section before section 3 of the bill. Section 3 of the bill has now been read. No amendment being offered to that section, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] was recognized to offer an amendment covering two sections to follow section 3 of the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. I thought some gentleman offered the substitute previously offered by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT] as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. That was voted down.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that the gentleman from Michigan can not offer two sections at once.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state, in response to the gentleman from Illinois, that a division may be demanded on the amendment and only one section be voted on at a time.

Mr. CORLISS. I have no objection to that, Mr. Chairman. That amendment, with the exception of the last three or four words, is identical with the bill that passed this House and the Senate in the Fifty-fourth Congress. It covers the two sections having reference to what are known as "birds of passage." Now, it was shown in the debate on that bill in the Fifty-fourth Congress that many thousands of able-bodied men, who are aliens, come to this country between the 1st of March and the 1st of December every year, many of them skilled artisans, earning in the aggregate millions of dollars, and, having families in foreign lands, take the fruits of labor in this country to their foreign homes at the end of each labor season. It was shown by the statistics from the immigration department that from 50,000 to 75,000 persons in different years come for that purpose.

These two sections were incorporated in that bill, and I have cut them out bodily. That bill was vetoed by President Cleveland. I have amended the section by adding the words "or citizens of countries of North America," making an exception of such persons. I want the Clerk to read the reference of President Cleveland to this paragraph, showing the only objection that he made to this provision. As will be observed, President Cleveland's only objection was that the provision barred out citizens of adjoining countries, and I have eliminated that feature.

The Clerk read as follows:

When we consider these provisions of the bill in connection with our long northern frontier and the boundaries of our States and Territories, often but an imaginary line separating them from the British Dominion, and recall the friendly intercourse between the people who are neighbors on either side, the provisions of this bill affecting them must be regarded as illiberal, narrow, and un-American.

The residents of these States and Territories have separate and especial interests which in many cases make an interchange of labor between their people and their alien neighbors most important, frequently with the advantage largely in favor of our citizens. This suggests the inexpediency of Federal interference with these conditions when not necessary to the correction of a substantial evil affecting the general welfare. Such unfriendly legislation as is proposed could hardly fail to provoke retaliatory measures, to the injury of many of our citizens who now find employment on adjoining foreign soil.

Mr. CORLISS. Now, Mr. Chairman, President Cleveland called attention to the possible evil of the bill in that it might affect citizens of Canada and Mexico, countries contiguous to our own. That was the only objection he made to the paragraph. In the amendment that I have offered I expressly except citizens of countries adjoining ours in North America.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. CORLISS. Yes.

Mr. HEPBURN. If you have excepted all on our northern and southern borders, who are left?

Mr. CORLISS. I will say to the gentleman that I have statistics from the Immigration Bureau which show that not less than 15,000 Europeans come into the port of New York and into Boston Harbor every spring and engage work about the coast as stone masons, bricklayers, and carpenters, as skilled artisans, earning from $2 to $5 a day, and at the end of the season they take the fruits of such labor to their foreign homes on foreign soil; every American labor organization in this country has asked Congress to recognize this evil and to stop it. You say you desire to stop immigration. Here is an opportunity to protect American labor, and American labor has asked us to unite on some immigration bill that will stop foreign aliens, nonresidents, from coming here to compete with him on our soil. This provision will protect them.

Mr. HEPBURN. I agree with what the gentleman stated, but these come from European points.

Mr. CORLISS. That is all my amendment.

Mr. HEPBURN (continuing.) But why exempt the Canadians and why exempt the Mexicans, when ten come from Canada to the United States for one that comes from a foreign port?

Mr. CORLISS. There is a good reason for exempting Canadians and Mexicans, because American interests are closely allied with theirs. The conditions by water and by rail are such as to necessitate a constant exchange of American citizens with Canadians. It does not particularly interfere with or menace the earnings of the laborer, as it did some years ago, not near as much, because the overflow of Canada is here now. Many young men of Canada have moved to our country and make the best citizens. Now, we want to stop the foreigner, the man in Europe and other lands, from coming here.

Mr. HEPBURN. In this debate from time to time I have heard the statement made that hundreds of thousands of Canadians come from Canada in the morning, take the place of some laborers of the United States during the day, and at night go back with the money and spend it over there.

Mr. CORLISS. Undoubtedly to some extent that is true; and it is true in my city and at Buffalo; but our citizens go there, and there is a distinction in effect that was seen and recognized; and appreciating the interest of labor, I have offered this amendment which eliminates the only possible objection that can be to it. It may interfere with the American citizens in Canada and in Mexico and not permit the free exchange between citizens of the United States and citizens of Canada, and between citizens of Mexico and the citizens of the United States, but it reaches the element which is the most dangerous and menacing to the labor of our country.

I can show you, for I have the statistics certified to by the immigration commissioner at Boston and New York, that 15,000 in one year entered those harbors and engaged employment as skilled laborers; that 75 per cent of them were men with families. I had the names of several who lived in Scotland and who every year for nearly fifteen years left their families in Scotland and came to the city of Boston and there worked in one factory as stonecutters. They got $5 a day. They were the best artisans of their trade. They did not live in this country. Their families were in Scotland. I had the names and the addresses and the facts to show that these men came here and engaged in work for four or five months, living in boarding houses, cheap places, and taking the fruits of their labor in America back to their foreign families on foreign soil and there educate their children and there purchase the supplies necessary to support their families.

I want the House to recognize the interests of American labor, who have asked repeatedly for this provision and who protested against the veto. To avoid any complications I have added the exception with reference to citizens of the two countries, Canada and Mexico, and I sincerely hope that there will be no objection to this provision.

Mr. WEEKS. Men come from Windsor over to Detroit to find employment there, and I would like to ask if the gentleman's amendment covers that?

Mr. CORLISS. It does not affect that question at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] by striking out the words "citizens of any country in North America." If there is any wisdom at all in the amendment that the gentleman has offered, and I think there is, it consists in this: That no foreign citizen that has no intention of becoming an American citizen shall come here and crowd an American laborer out of his job and take the proceeds of his labor back to his foreign home and enjoy them there. If that is a sound position, and I think it is, no man can give a good reason why a Canadian or a Mexican shall be permitted to cross the border, come here and earn wages, crowd out an American laborer and take his wages back to his foreign home and enjoy them in Canada or Mexico any more than he can come over from England, Germany, Russia, or the Lord knows where.

Indeed, the reason of the rule applies more to Canadians and Mexicans than it does to the other nationalities, because it is easier for them to get in here; and the proposition of the gentleman from Michigan illustrates the evil of making exceptions to the general rule. If you say that no foreigner shall come here, crowd out one of our laborers and take his earnings out of the country—and they do it by the thousands—you can go before an intelligent constituency and stand on it, but I would like very much to see any man in this House address an intelligent audience in the United States and undertake to defend the proposition that foreign laborers not intending to become citizens shall come in and crowd out an American from his job and take his wages away from him, unless they be Canadians or unless they be Mexicans, in which two cases they may come in ad libitum.

Mr. CORLISS. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry?

Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Mr. CORLISS. Are you not aware that the character of the laborer and his wages in Canada are relatively very much higher than the laborer of Europe?

Mr. CLARK. That may be true.

Mr. CORLISS. And that the demand for labor in Canada is much higher, and that therefore the danger of the laborer from European competition is greater than that of Canada?

Mr. CLARK. That is partly true and partly not true. The traditional American position is in favor of welcoming honest, industrious, moral, healthy, law-abiding white people who come to this country to become citizens and establish homes—to remain here and to become part and parcel of us. Many of our best citizens are foreign-born persons and their children; but the laborers of this country do not believe anybody who does not intend to become an American citizen has a right to come over here and stay and labor in this country and earn wages and take them back to the foreign country and there spend them.

If you would add this amendment of the gentleman from Michigan, as amended by my amendment, to this bill it will keep out nine-tenths of the undesirable people that come to this country simply to make money without becoming citizens, because the statistics of the last census show, notwithstanding the flood of immigration in the country, in 1900 there were fewer people in the country of foreign birth, and fewer people one remove from foreign birth, than there were in 1880; and there is not a man living that can give any reason for an exception to this proposition in favor of Canadians and Mexicans.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I want to be consistent, and I want to pass this bill. This putting on of so many riders will have a tendency to hurt the bill. Without discussing the merits of these amendments I want to get rid of them, because I want the bill to finally pass the House and the Senate, and therefore I insist on the point of order that the amendments are not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] submits an amendment, or rather two amendments, in the form of two sections, to which the point of order was made and reserved by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC]. The debate has been exhausted, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHATTUC] calls for a decision on the point of order.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman wish to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to discuss the point of order, but I want to address myself to the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri for the moment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will first dispose of the point of order made upon these two amendments. The bill before the House is a bill regulating the immigration of aliens into the United States. The scope of the measure is exceedingly broad, and any amendment relating directly to the general scope and intent of the bill would be germane.

These amendments bring in an entirely new subject not alluded to in the bill, but relating to contract labor and contract-labor laws. If the Chair did not feel convinced in his own mind on this point of order, he would feel inclined to follow the decision made by Mr. Speaker Reed in the Fifty-fourth Congress, which the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CORLISS] will undoubtedly recall. On an immigration bill similar to the pending bill amendments similar to the pending amendments were offered, and points of order were made against them. The points of order were sustained by Mr. Reed on the ground that the amendments relating to contract labor were not germane to an immigration bill. In view of the precedent established by Mr. Speaker Reed, and in accordance with what seems to the Chair to be correct parliamentary practice, the point of order is sustained on the ground that the amendments are not germane to the subject-matter of the bill.

Mr. SHATTUC. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOUTELL reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 12199) to regulate the immigration of aliens into the United States and had come to no resolution thereon.

NATIONAL SANITARIUM AT SOLDIERS' HOME, HOT SPRINGS.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, by unanimous consent, called up from the Speaker's table the following concurrent resolution of the Senate; which was read, considered, and adopted.

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the Committee on Enrolled Bills, in the enrollment of the bill (S. 566) for the establishment, control, operation, and maintenance of a national sanitarium of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers at Hot Springs, in the State of South Dakota, are hereby authorized to strike out the words "Branch Home" from line 12, page 1, and insert in lieu thereof the word "sanitarium."

LIFE-SAVING STATION AT MONOMOY ISLAND, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. LOVERING. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13168) to establish an additional life-saving station on Monomoy Island, Massachusetts.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish an additional life-saving station on Monomoy Island, Massachusetts, at such point as the General Superintendent of the Life-Saving Service may recommend.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Has this bill been reported by any committee of the House?

Mr. LOVERING. It has been reported unanimously by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I should like to know how much expense is involved?

Mr. LOVERING. Practically no expense. It is simply for the reestablishment of a station which it was contemplated to abandon, but recent disasters have proved that it is necessary to have this station reestablished.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The bill provides for no expenditure whatever, as I understand.

Mr. LOVERING. None but for mere repairs. That is all.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. What is the necessity, may I ask, for the passage of the bill?

Mr. LOVERING. The necessity for the reestablishment of this station grows out of the recent disaster at Monomoy Island, where 12 lives were lost. It has been proved that had this station been in operation at the time there would have been no loss of life. There were more lives and more property rescued on this island than at any other point in the whole United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. LOVERING. I ask unanimous consent that a bill which has passed the Senate, absolutely identical with this House bill, be substituted.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. As I understand, the Senate bill is identical?

Mr. LOVERING. It is.

The SPEAKER. Has the Senate bill been reported back from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce? It does not seem to be in the possession of the Clerk.

Mr. LOVERING. Then I ask that the House bill be passed.

The question being taken, the bill of the House was passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS SAVANNAH RIVER.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate bill No. 5406.

The bill (S. 5406) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Savannah River from the mainland of Aiken County, S. C., to the mainland of Richmond County, Ga., was read.

There being no objection, the House proceeded to the consideration of the bill; which was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. MERCER. I ask unanimous consent that the House nonconcur in the amendments of the Senate to House bill 14018, the public-buildings bill.

There being no objection, it was ordered accordingly.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. MERCER, Mr. GILLET of New York, and Mr. BANKHEAD as conferees on the part of the House.

COMMITTEE ASSIGNMENTS.

The SPEAKER announced the following committee assignments:

District of Columbia—Mr. MCANDREWS of Illinois.

Library—Mr. MCCLELLAN of New York.

Labor—Mr. RYAN of New York.

Expenditures in the Department of Justice—Mr. STEPHENS of Texas.

Immigration and Naturalization—Mr. FLOOD of Virginia.

Claims—Mr. GOOCH of Kentucky, and Mr. RHEA of Virginia.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. RANDELL of Texas, for three days, on account of important business.

To Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. GAINES of West Virginia, for two days, on account of important business.

To Mr. SCOTT, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. WILLIAMS of Illinois, for this week, on account of illness.

AMENDMENT OF HOUSE RULES.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee calls up the following privileged report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Rules, to whom was referred the resolution numbered 266, have had the same under consideration and report in lieu thereof the following:

"Resolved, That the following be added to the rules of the House as section 2 of Rule XXIX:

"'It shall not be in order to consider the report of a committee of conference until such report and the accompanying statement shall have been printed in the RECORD, except on either of the six days preceding the end of a session.'"

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, this substitute is for the resolution introduced by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN]. It simply provides that conference reports must be first printed in the daily RECORD before they are to be called up for consideration in the House. It does not affect their privileged character when called up, but simply postpones their consideration until they shall have been printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The exception is made in favor of the last six days of the session, because at that time it is supposed we may be more or less hurried, and the exception is made that those reports will not have to be first printed.

Mr. MCRAE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MCRAE. I would ask if the gentleman does not think, if we are to have these printed, that they should be printed in bill form. Printing a report in the RECORD does not show us at once what the committee has done.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. We not only print the report in the RECORD, but the rule requires the printing of the accompanying statement.

Mr. MCRAE. When a long conference report is printed in the RECORD, it often takes a man half a day to get at what is done. In bill form it would be of some use to us. I think the printing of it would be of no benefit practically unless it is printed in bill form, to show what is done and proposed.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would state to my friend from Arkansas that the object of printing the report in the RECORD is to call the attention of the House to what the conferees have done.

Mr. MCRAE. I understand that, yes; but unless attention is called to what is done by printing the amendments and changes proposed we can not tell whether the report is correct or not.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It is right there for them to see.

Mr. MCRAE. You may take a conference report on any of the large appropriation bills, and I undertake to say there are not ten men in the House who in half a day can tell what it means by reading the report in the RECORD. It will take considerable time to ascertain what these amendments mean unless they are printed in bill form in connection with the text of the bill.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. The gentleman will observe that this requires the printing of the accompanying statement, and it is the statement which gives the information, anyway, as to what the report of the conferees includes. I think there will be no difficulty. It will be just as easy to make the comparison with the printed copy in the RECORD as if it were in bill form.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does this provide that the conference report shall be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Upon presentation, without asking unanimous consent?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. They shall be printed; yes, sir.

Mr. MANN. Does it say they shall be printed in the RECORD?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will ask that the Clerk report the rule again. I so understood it.

Mr. CANNON. They are always printed in the RECORD.

Mr. MANN. They are when called up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the Clerk will again report the resolution.

The Clerk again read the resolution.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Upon presentation of a conference report, is it a matter of right that it shall be printed in the RECORD, without an order of the House?

The SPEAKER. It is an absolute duty under this rule, the Chair thinks.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. It can not be considered until it is.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] if the exception there is not too ample. Originally, as the resolution was introduced, it made an exception of those reports that were made during the last three days of the session, and the reason for that was the statement that often the business was perhaps purposely delayed on the part of some person until the last few days for the very purpose, possibly, of the House not having as full an understanding as it otherwise might. I do not know that that was his language, but it was the inference that I drew, and I am fearful that as the rush comes just at the last we are going to have too much room in that exception, and I would prefer the resolution as it originally read.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I understand that the question is addressed to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON].

Mr. CANNON. The resolution says six days. Now, in the last six days it is in order to move to suspend the rules, as the gentleman is aware. I do not consider it very important whether it is three days or six days. I should have been entirely content if it had been three days instead of six, because if there had been any special pressure the House undoubtedly would suspend the rules for the first three days of the six. There is an abuse almost unavoidable that is liable to happen in the last six days or the last three days of the session, when everything is crowding for consideration, and you do as much business ordinarily in six days as you would do in a month or six weeks at another stage of the session. I would be perfectly willing to see it three days instead of six.

Mr. LACEY. I should like to call the attention of the gentleman in charge of the measure to one possible difficulty, and ask him what he thinks about this: In the last Congress, if I remember right, there were no last six days. There was only one of those days.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. You mean in the long session?

Mr. LACEY. In the long session. In other words, in the long session, until a resolution of adjournment has passed the two Houses, we do not know when the six days will begin, and in the last long session we did not agree to the adjournment resolution until the last day. Consequently, there were no last six days. Might this not give us some trouble?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I will state to the gentleman that the Committee on Rules considered that very carefully.

That was suggested while the committee were considering this proposed rule, and we thought that if the difficulty which the gentleman from Iowa suggests should arise that the Committee on Rules could very well bring in a proposition to vacate this rule during the remainder of the session. We could obviate the difficulty by simply bringing in a rule abrogating this rule for the remainder of the session.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table..

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

He also presented a petition of 20 citizens of Barkeyville, Pa., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators by direct vote of the people; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also presented petitions of the Philadelphia Maritime Exchange, of Philadelphia, and of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the enactment of legislation granting pensions to certain officers and enlisted men in the Life-Saving Service, their widows and minor children; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the Engineers' Society of Western Pennsylvania, Pittsburg, praying for the adoption of the metric system of weights and measures; which was referred to the Select Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures.

He also presented petitions of 318 citizens of Indiana County, 23 citizens of Lancaster, 39 citizens of Philadelphia, in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of Senate bill 1890, providing a service pension for those who served in the Army of the Union during the civil war; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of 380 citizens of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the outage allowance on whisky made subsequent to January 1, 1899; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented petitions of McPherson Post, No. 1, Grand Army of the Republic, of Little Rock, Ark.; of Union Veteran Legion, of Manayunk, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation providing a service pension for those who served in the Army of the Union during the civil war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a memorial of Mount Chestnut Grange, No. 133, of Butler County, Pa., remonstrating against the passage of bill providing for the irrigation of arid lands; which was referred to the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands.

He also presented a petition of 34 citizens of Easton, Pa., praying for the repeal of the duty on beef, veal, mutton, and pork; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by 250 citizens of Philadelphia and at a meeting of the Liederkranz of Scranton, in the State of Pennsylvania, expressing sympathy with the people of the South African Republic and the Orange Free State; which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Colonel P. B. Hansom Post, No. 309, Department of Pennsylvania, Grand Army of the Republic, of Chambersburg, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the improvement and extension of the post-exchange system; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of 92 citizens of Williamsport, Pa., and of the Gospel Temperance Union of Oshkosh, Wis., praying for the enactment of legislation prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Soldiers' Homes of the country; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of Local Division No. 45, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of West Philadelphia; of Jersey Shore Division No. 168, Order of Railway Conductors, of Jersey Shore; of Lodge No. 259, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Easton; of Lackawanna Division No. 12, Order of Railway Conductors, of Scranton; of Division No. 162, Order of Railway Conductors, of West Philadelphia; of Packer Lodge No. 85, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen of Easton; of Lodge No. 174, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Altoona; of Lodge No. 228, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Bradford; of Division No. 310, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Derry Station; of Butler Lodge No. 591, Brotherhood Railroad Trainmen, of Butler; of Lodge No. 383, of Harrisburg; of Lodge No. 451, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, of Foxburg, all in the State of Pennsylvania, praying for the passage of the so-called Hoar anti-injunction bill to limit the meaning of the word "conspiracy" and the use of "restraining orders and injunctions" in certain cases and remonstrating against the passage of any substitute therefor; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of New Haven, Conn., praying for the adoption of certain amendments to the interstate-commerce law; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 253, United Mine Workers, of Wooldridge, Tenn., praying for the passage of the so-called Hoar anti-injunction bill to limit the meaning of the word "conspiracy" and the use of "restraining orders and injunctions" in certain cases; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Lemonweir Convention of Congregational churches of Nekoosa, Wis., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors in Army posts and immigrant stations; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the amendment submitted by himself on the 15th instant, proposing to increase the appropriation for the purchase of text-books and school supplies for use of pupils of the first eight grades, etc., intended to be proposed to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, reported favorably thereon, and moved that it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and printed; which was agreed to.

He also, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 7704) granting an increase of pension to Christiana Leach;

A bill (H. R. 11831) granting an increase of pension to John W. Acker;

A bill (H. R. 7076) granting an increase of pension to Leath Gilliland; and

A bill (H. R. 8003) granting an increase of pension to Louisa M. Macfarlane.

Mr. GALLINGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 12828) granting a pension to Mary E. Culver, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HOAR. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11060) to limit the meaning of the word "conspiracy" and the use of "restraining orders and injunctions" in certain cases, to report it with an amendment, and to submit a report thereon. I am directed by the same committee to ask that Senate bill 4553, being a bill with the same title, heretofore reported and on the Calendar, be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The House bill will be placed on the Calendar and the Senate bill indefinitely postponed if there be no objection. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CULLOM. May I ask the Senator whether the Senate bill first reported is the bill we are receiving so many letters about? That is Senate bill 1118, I think.

Mr. HOAR. There was a former report on that bill, but of course the House having passed a bill, which is now reported with an amendment, the Senate bill can be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. CULLOM. Is that the bill all these organizations desire to have passed?

Mr. HOAR. Yes.

Mr. CULLOM. The Senator's committee recommend its passage.

Mr. HOAR. With an amendment.

Mr. BERRY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 5679) to authorize the construction of two bridges across the Ashley River, in the counties of Charleston and Dorchester, S. C.; and

A bill (S. 5749) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Tennessee River, in the State of Tennessee, by the Harriman Southern Railroad Company.

Mr. PENROSE, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1206) for the relief of Frank J. Burrows, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 604) for the relief of Frank J. Burrows, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be postponed indefinitely; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 622) for the relief of Frank J. Burrows, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be postponed indefinitely; which was agreed to.

Mr. HANSBROUGH, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4202) to regulate the sale of intoxicating liquors in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HALE. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back with amendments the bill (H. R. 14589) making appropriations to supply additional urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1902; and I ask that it may be considered at the present time.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was on page 2, after line 7, to insert:

Public printing and binding: For the Department of the Interior, including the Civil Service Commission, $42,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following:

For the Navy Department, including the Hydrographic Office, $22,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following:

SENATE.

For expenses of maintaining and equipping horses and mail wagons, for carrying the mails, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following:

For fuel, oil, and cotton waste, and advertising, for the heating apparatus, exclusive of labor, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add the following:

For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers to committees at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding $1.25 per printed page, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HALE. It has been suggested to me that I move a conference on these amendments and that the conferees upon the part of the Senate be instructed, but I do not think there is a necessity for anything of that kind. I am entirely willing to trust to the discretion and good sense of the House in dealing with the amendments. Therefore I shall not make any such motion.

Mr. SPOONER. Is it the request of the House for a conference?

Mr. HALE. No; it is certain amendments made by the Senate to a House bill. The Senate can, if it chooses, ask for a conference and instruct its conferees not to agree to a change in the amendments, but that I do not think would be good parliamentary practice. I think we can put the amendments into conference and trust the House to deal in a reasonable way with them.

Mr. SPOONER. I agree entirely with the Senator in his proposition.

ARTHUR J. BUSHNELL.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am directed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13395) granting a pension to Arthur J. Bushnell, to report it without amendment.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let it be read for information.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration. It proposes to place on the pension roll the name of Arthur J. Bushnell, late of Company A, First Regiment South Dakota Volunteer Infantry, war with Spain, and to pay him a pension of $20 per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. ALLISON introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 5945) granting an increase of pension to Jeremiah S. Alexander; and

A bill (S. 5946) granting an increase of pension to Edward Walsh.

Mr. BLACKBURN introduced a bill (S. 5947) for the relief of Elias J. Riley, administrator of John Riley, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TURNER introduced a bill (S. 5948) to amend an act entitled "An act to prohibit the coming into, and to regulate the residence within, the United States, its Territories, and all territory under its jurisdiction, and the District of Columbia, of Chinese and persons of Chinese descent," approved April 29, 1902; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. DUBOIS introduced a bill (S. 5949) for the relief of certain naval officers and their legal representatives; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MALLORY introduced a bill (S. 5950) for the relief of Henry O. Bassett, heir of Henry Opeman Bassett, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. NELSON introduced a bill (S. 5951) to establish a laboratory for the study of the criminal, pauper, and defective classes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. McMILLAN introduced a bill (S. 5952) granting an increase of pension to Henry L. Davenport; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5953) granting a pension to Ann M. Green; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. GAMBLE introduced a bill (S. 5954) for the relief of William H. H. Lee; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut introduced a bill (S. 5955) for the relief of the representatives of M. F. Merritt, deceased; which was twice read by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. QUAY introduced a bill (S. 5956) to provide for the allotment of the lands of the Cherokee Nation, for the disposition of town sites therein, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CARMACK introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 5957) for the relief of the estate of H. J. Binkley, deceased;

A bill (S. 5958) for the relief of the heirs of R. G. Rawley; and

A bill (S. 5959) for the relief of Clifton Lodge, No. 173, Free and Accepted Masons.

Mr. COCKRELL introduced a bill (S. 5960) granting a pension to Ella G. Day; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. COCKRELL. To accompany the bill I present the petition of Ella G. Day for pension, together with the decision of the Secretary of the Interior affirming the rejection of her claim. I move that the bill and accompanying papers be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 5961) granting an increase of pension to Mary P. Sheets; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 5962) granting a pension to Sarah

J. Cline; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 5963) granting a pension to Sarah Jane Gibson Ogden; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

Mr. STEWART. I introduce a joint resolution and ask for its present consideration. It removes certain objections that the President has to the Indian appropriation bill recently passed. The subcommittee have considered it, and I hope it will pass.

The joint resolution (S. R. 105) supplementing and modifying certain provisions of the Indian appropriation act for the year ending June 30, 1903, was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, etc., That the provisions of the act "making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and for other purposes," are hereby supplemented and modified as follows:

The Secretary of the Interior is directed to make allotments in severalty to the Indians of the Spokane Indian Reservation in the State of Washington, and upon the completion of such allotments the President shall by proclamation give public notice thereof, whereupon the lands in said reservation not allotted to Indians or used or reserved by the Government, or occupied for school purposes, shall be opened to exploration, location, occupation, and purchase under the mining laws.

In addition to the allotment in severalty of lands in the Walker River Indian Reservation, in the State of Nevada, the Secretary of the Interior shall, before any of said lands are opened to disposition under any public-land law, select and set apart for the use in common of the Indians of that reservation such an amount of nonirrigable grazing lands therein at one or more places as will subserve the reasonable requirements of said Indians for the grazing of live stock.

In addition to the allotments in severalty to the Uintah and White River Utes of the Uintah Indian Reservation in the State of Utah, the Secretary of the Interior shall, before any of said lands are opened to disposition under any public land law, select and set apart for the use in common of the Indians of that reservation such an amount of nonirrigable grazing lands therein at one or more places as will subserve the reasonable requirements of said Indians for the grazing of live stock.

All allotments hereafter made to Uncompahgre Indians of lands in said Uintah Indian Reservation shall be confined to agricultural land which can be irrigated, and shall be on the basis of 80 acres to each head of a family, and 40 acres to each other Indian, and no more. The grazing land selected and set apart as aforesaid in the Uintah Indian Reservation for the use in common of the Indians of that reservation shall be equally open to the use of all Uncompahgre Indians receiving allotments in said reservation of the reduced area here named.

In so far as not otherwise specially provided all allotments in severalty to Indians outside of the Indian Territory shall be made in conformity to the provisions of the act approved February 8, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes," and other general acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, and shall be subject to all the restrictions and carry all the privileges incident to allotments made under said act and other general acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto.

The item of $70,064.48 appropriated by the act, which is hereby supplemented and modified, to be paid to the Uintah and White River tribes of Ute Indians in satisfaction of certain obligations named in said act, shall be paid to the Indians entitled thereto without awaiting their action upon the proposed allotment in severalty of lands in that reservation and the restoration of the surplus lands to the public domain.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. RAWLINS. I did not hear the reading of the joint resolution. I should like to know what it is before I consent to its consideration. I ask the Clerk to send it to me.

Mr. STEWART. Can it be postponed for a moment and other business taken up while the Senator from Utah is reading it?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair avails itself of this opportunity to lay before the Senate sundry messages from the House of Representatives.

Mr. RAWLINS subsequently said: Mr. President, I do not object to the present consideration of the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Nevada.

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RAWLINS. I move to amend the joint resolution on page 3, in the last paragraph, by striking out the word "obligations" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "claims." It is the clause in regard to the payment of $70,000 "in satisfaction of the claims mentioned in said act."

Mr. STEWART. I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is accepted by the Senator who introduced the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM C. HICKCOX.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives on the bill (H. R. 4103) granting a pension to William C. Hickcox and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. PRITCHARD, and Mr. TURNER were appointed.

JOHN H. LAUCHEY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8840) granting an increase of pension to John H. Lauchey and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. DEBOE, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. GIBSON were appointed.

HENRY I. SMITH.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 8794) granting an increase of pension to Henry I. Smith and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. FOSTER of Washington, Mr. BURTON, and Mr. CARMACK were appointed.

GEORGE W. BARRY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9544) granting an increase of pension to George W. Barry, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I make the same motion in regard to this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. GALLINGER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. PATTERSON were appointed.

SOLOMON P. BROCKWAY.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10545) granting an increase of pension to Solomon P. Brockway and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. GALLINGER. I make the same motion in regard to this bill.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate, and Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. SIMON, and Mr. TALIAFERRO were appointed.

DISTRIBUTION OF CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2296) to amend an act approved March 2, 1895, relating to public printing; and it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

J. G. HOWELL.

On motion of Mr. PENROSE, it was Ordered, That leave be granted to withdraw from the files of the Senate the papers in the case of J. G. Howell, alias Gideon Howell, accompanying Senate bill No. 3415, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, copies of the same to be left in the files as provided by clause 2 of Rule XXX.

LIEUTENANT ARNOLD AND SERGEANT EDWARDS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a preceding day, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution submitted yesterday by Mr. CULBERSON, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to send to the Senate copies of all official papers in his possession which relate to charges against Lieutenant Arnold and Sergeant Edwards by Private Andrew K. Weir, including the report of Capt. P. W. West, United States Army, of date August 21, 1901.

Mr. LODGE. Before the resolution is adopted I should like to know whether these charges are the foundation of a court-martial, and whether the court-martial is in progress. It seems to me we can hardly call for papers if a court-martial is pending. I myself know nothing whatever about the case.

Mr. CULBERSON. These charges are of long standing. The report was made on the 21st or 22d of August, 1901. Whether there has been a court-martial as a result of the charges I am not advised, as I stated yesterday in answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER].

Mr. SPOONER. Will not the Senater let the resolution go over until to-morrow?

Mr. CULBERSON. The Senate will not meet to-morrow.

Mr. SPOONER. Until Monday. I intended to inquire about it, but I have had no opportunity to do so.

Mr. CULBERSON. I will state to the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Massachusetts that my information, which, by the way, is quite meager, of course, is that no court-martial has been ordered in this case. We desire to have copies of all official papers from the War Department concerning the matter. The resolution could go over in order that the information suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin might be obtained, but I state to him, as I did a moment ago, that my information is that no court-martial has been ordered. However, that information is necessarily of a meager character.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Texas is a lawyer and a good one. I know that if there is any investigation being conducted by the War Department preliminary to a court-martial, he would not wish the Senate to interfere with the matter. I want no concealment. I think the Senator will be willing to admit that. I intended to inquire, after our colloquy yesterday, what is the status of this matter, but I have had no opportunity to do so. If the Senator insists upon action on the resolution this morning, I hope the chairman of the Committee on the Philippines will move to refer it to that committee, in order that we may ascertain the status of the matter.

Mr. LODGE. I shall make that motion unless the resolution can be laid over.

Mr. CULBERSON. If it is the desire of the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Massachusetts simply to inquire at the War Department whether court-martial proceedings are pending, I am willing that the resolution shall lie over until this afternoon in order that the inquiry may be made.

Mr. SPOONER. I think a court-martial had better be ordered in the usual way rather than to be conducted before the committee. So I think it might be just as well and wholly as fair to have the resolution lie over until Monday, if that course is agreeable to the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. If the resolution can go over until Monday I will make inquiry in regard to it in the meantime, but if action is desired to-day, then I will make a motion to refer it to the committee.

Mr. CULBERSON. Under the circumstances I will let the resolution go over until Monday, it being the best I can do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution goes over until Monday, remaining on the table at the call of the Senator from Texas.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. C. R. MCKENNEY, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9960) to prevent a false branding or marking of food and dairy products as to the State or Territory in which they are made or produced, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HEPBURN, Mr. SHERMAN, and Mr. RICHARDSON of Alabama managers at the conference on the part of the House.

The message also announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14018) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes, asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. MERCER, Mr. GILLET of New York, and Mr. BANKHEAD managers at the conference on the part of the House.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PROCTOR. If the morning business is closed, I ask that the Army appropriation bill and the message from the House asking for a conference on the bill be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the following message from the House of Representatives; which was read:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, May 20, 1902.

Resolved, That the House disagrees to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, and asks a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. HULL, Mr. CAPRON, and Mr. HAY be the managers of the conference on the part of the House, with the following instructions:

Whereas Senate amendments numbered 13, 14, and 15 to the bill (H. R. 12804) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year 1903 makes the proposed appropriation of $4,000,000 for barracks and quarters available for the construction of such permanent buildings at established military posts as the Secretary of War may deem necessary, and reappropriates from unexpended balances of former appropriations for barracks and quarters $350,000 for construction of necessary garrison buildings, notwithstanding appropriations for said objects are made, in accordance with the rules and practice of the House, in the sundry civil appropriation bill for said year; and

Whereas said amendments are subversive of the rules of the House, duplicate appropriations, and tend to confusion in the methods of making appropriations for the support of the Government, and will, if agreed to, give rise to a practice that will inevitably result in extravagant and wasteful expenditures: Therefore,

Resolved, That the managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill H. R. 12804 are instructed not to recommend an agreement to said amendments Nos. 13, 14, and 15, or to any modification thereof that will, under authority of said Army appropriation act, permit the expenditure of any sum for construction of permanent buildings at established military posts, except as authorized by section 1136 of the Revised Statutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill and message are before the Senate. What action will the Senate take?

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator from Vermont, who is in charge of the bill, what he proposes in answer to this message?

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, it presents an unusual and certainly a new condition to me. I in the first instance asked to have it laid before the Senate to learn, if possible, what it is the disposition of the Senate to do in the matter.

Mr. BURROWS. Is the Senator going to make any motion?

Mr. PROCTOR. There seems to be a backwardness about coming forward, and to bring the matter before the Senate, without the expression of an opinion on my part as to whether it is wise or not, I will move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont moves that the Senate insist upon its amendments to the bill and accede to the request of the House for a conference. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SPOONER. I hoped the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] and other Senators, who have been here very much longer than I, would have something to say upon this question, and I rather infer that they will, unless I am wrong in the view which I take of it.

It does not need to be said that it is of the utmost consequence in the public interest that there should be perfect harmony between the two Houses and that each House should, in order to that end, meet the other with entire courtesy. I admit the right—I assume it to be established—of either House to instruct its conferees. I have always understood, however, that that was not customary at the time of requesting the first conference.

I know nothing about the merits of the particular amendments to which the House in advance have disagreed—I will not say "nothing," but not much. I am not sure that those amendments ought to have been incorporated in the bill, and I am not at all sure that I would not vote, if that question were here, that the Senate recede from the amendments. I rather think I would.

But, Mr. President, it seems to me that the procedure is entirely inadmissible and one which, if persisted in—my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] prophesied the other day that there would be no recurrence of this procedure——

Mr. HALE. I was mistaken.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator was mistaken then. If the Senate acquiesces now there will be no end, I think, to the recurrence.

Our conferences are free conferences, not limited conferences, which are sometimes, in other countries and perhaps in this, invoked. For one House to request a full and free conference of another, and accompany the request with a resolution, sent with a message to us or by us to the other House, that the conferees on the part of the body requesting the conference have been precluded by instruction from a full and free conference, seems to me not only offensive, but absurd.

If the House or the Senate can courteously and properly take this course as to one amendment made by the other, it can take it as to all amendments. If it is proper to pursue this course as to the particular amendments to which this message applies, it is entirely proper, if the House so choose, to embody in such instructions every amendment put upon the bill by the Senate; and it would not be very long until practically the Senate's power of amendment, so far as that is worked out through conferences, would be at an end, and so, not as a matter of etiquette, but as a matter in the interest of the people, the general public interest, I feel that the Senate ought not to agree to a conference requested under such circumstances.

There is projected into this message another proposition, which, with all proper respect for the House of Representatives—and I entertain it, as they must for this branch of the legislative department of the Government—and that is, that either is to be restrained or influenced in the exercise of its power of amendment by the rules of the other. Each House, Mr. President, is given by the Constitution the power to adopt rules for its own government; neither House is given power to adopt rules for the government of the other; and the proposition that an amendment adopted to a bill by the Senate, by unanimous consent, if you please, is to be excluded in the other House without regard to the merits of the proposition, but because under the rules of the House it could not have been offered there, is one which I think we ought not to concede.

So, if I had my way about it, desiring as much as any man here can desire perfect harmony between the two Houses, but realizing, as I think everyone here must realize, that in order to that harmony each House must be permitted to proceed in accordance with its own rules and the conferees of each House in the beginning be at liberty to insist or recede and report to their respective Houses their decision. I think this request ought not to be granted.

We have not, that I know of, any joint rules.

Mr. ALLISON. We have not.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator from Iowa says we have no joint rules; and possibly we ought to have them, but that is a matter for mutual conference and consideration.

I should not be willing that the Senate in any abrupt way should decline this conference, but I think the Senate ought respectfully, under the circumstances, to submit the reasons for its action and to decline the conference. I think the Senate should appoint a committee of three—I would say of the older members of the body—to confer with the proper authorities of the House of Representatives with a view to some adjustment of the procedure which would do two things: First, leave each House to operate under its own rules, and second, lead to full and free conferences, with the right of each House at the proper time to instruct for itself, and in that way to bring about and perpetuate that necessary harmony between the two Houses which we all desire.

I may be all wrong about this. I have no feeling about it in the world except one of regret; but I believe that if the Senate acquiesce in this proposition, there will be no end of it. I believe that within limits we ought to have done it the other day. We ought to present this matter in a dignified, courteous, and proper way to the House, in order that we may be unembarrassed hereafter by similar suggestions.

I want to repeat what I said in the beginning, that I should be quite willing, from what I know of these amendments, to recede from them, but I protest against this method.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I do not know how I can add anything to what has been so well said by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], unless it be the suggestion of a remedy for the difficulty in which we find ourselves. I understand that the Senator from Wisconsin has suggested no way out, except only that in some proper way we communicate with the House our objections to being instructed.

Mr. SPOONER. I said appoint a committee to confer. I only suggested that. I do not know that that is the best way.

Mr. FORAKER. I have another suggestion in my mind which I will say was suggested to me—it did not originate with me—but one that I approve, not knowing of anything better to suggest, unless it is what the Senator from Wisconsin has just now suggested, and that is that we divide the motion which has been made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] and instead of agreeing to the conference, as that motion provides, that we simply insist upon our amendments and send the bill back to the House in that form. That will give the House another opportunity to act. It does seem to me that the House, when it comes to consider what has been done and the character of that action, will reconsider it and take a different action. I do not contend that their action is without precedent. There is perhaps a precedent for it, but, if so, what I am about to read will apply and express very well the character of the action that has been taken. I read from the note found on page 12 of Senate Report No. 1545 at this session of Congress:

> In Section XLV, Jefferson's Manual, it is stated that "either House is free to pass over the term of insisting and to adhere in the first instance, but it is not respectful to the other. In the ordinary parliamentary course there are two free conferences, at least, before an adherence."

I am sure, Mr. President, that the House does not want to be disrespectful to the Senate.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. FORAKER. And the House could not have supposed that taking that action would be regarded by the Senate as disrespectful, and yet I think the House will agree with the Senate and with everybody else, when second thought is taken, that the action is disrespectful and that the Senate can not disregard it and pass it over without sacrificing its own dignity, its own honor, and its own feeling of respect for itself, which it always should maintain.

I do not understand that the Senator made any motion, and in order that I may get an expression of the sense of the Senate in regard to it, as affording a way out of the difficulty and as giving the House an opportunity to recede, which I think the House will when it comes to consider the matter, I ask that the motion made by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] be divided—that is the proper way, I suppose, to put it—so that we may vote first on that part of the motion which provides that the Senate shall insist on its amendments, with the idea that we will vote down the other part of it, that we agree to a conference; because, Mr. President, it is useless to talk about a full and free conference with such instructions to the House conferees as the House has given. It may be full and free as to certain of the differences, but it can not be full and free, and therefore it can not be a conference at all, as to the three amendments specified.

I am a little differently situated from the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] with respect to these amendments. I am a member of the Committee on Military Affairs and participated in the action of that committee, as well as in the action of the Senate, in drafting and reporting and adopting these amendments; but I do not stop here to consider the merits of the amendments. This is entirely aside from the merits of the amendments.

Mr. CULLOM. I wish to inquire whether the amendments referred to, as to which instructions were given to the House conferees, were placed in the bill before it was considered in the Senate, or were the amendments offered in the Senate and adopted by the Senate itself?

Mr. PROCTOR rose.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] rises to answer that question, and I yield to him.

Mr. PROCTOR. Mr. President, the amendments to which the Senator from Illinois refers were adopted by the Committee on Military Affairs, and they were passed by the Senate as reported by the committee.

While I am explaining that matter, permit me to say that I question somewhat the wisdom of the amendments in their entirety. All the principle involved, as I have suggested, is just this: There is an old statute which prohibits the erection of any building costing more than $20,000 from the appropriation for barracks and quarters.

Aside from that prohibition, this appropriation for barracks and quarters and for military posts is used in large measure indiscriminately for the same purposes; and where they are repairing or rebuilding a post building or constructing a new one, if there is a building to cost more than $20,000—and some of them frequently do cost more, as in the case of artillery parks, and occasionally where there are double sets of quarters—they sometimes have to straddle, if I may use that expression; that is, they take part of the money for such expensive buildings from the barracks and quarters appropriation, and wherever a building cost more than $20,000 they go over to the appropriation in the sundry civil bill for military posts. That is sometimes an inconvenience; and this amendment I suppose did that, so far as this appropriation was concerned, with that prohibition. I question whether it ought to be done away with entirely; but I thought it was wise, in view of the contingencies just now, that it should be removed so far as that part of this appropriation was concerned. I have no question but what, if the bill went into a free conference, the differences could be adjusted without any violation of the practice or any injury to the views of the House.

Mr. FORAKER. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR] for interrupting and answering the question of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM]; but I was about to proceed to answer it, so far as the question related to the action of the committee, just as the Senator from Vermont has done. These amendments were discussed and agreed upon in the Committee on Military Affairs and reported from that committee in the ordinary way. They were not put upon this bill without full consideration. I am unlike the Senator from Vermont in this, that I do not question the wisdom of these amendments. I think there was a necessity for the increased appropriation that these amendments embody, and the wisdom of our providing that we would not be bound in the expenditure of this money by the $20,000 limit to which the Senator refers is easily demonstrated, it seems to me.

We have a perfect right in legislating in connection with this appropriation bill so to legislate as to make a new law in that particular, just as Congress has a right to repeal any other statute or to repeal any other provision. We found that there was a provision as a general law which was bound to hamper the Department in the expenditure of money which we proposed to authorize them to expend, and that they could not proceed as common sense and as common economy required they should. So we changed the law in such a way as to give to the War Department the authority necessary to judiciously and wisely expend this money.

Mr. President, I do not propose now to discuss this particular amendment. I shall contend for that amendment as a proper one, as one of which I entirely approve when the proper time comes for that; but what we are concerned about now is simply the action of the House. I do not want, although I think the action of the House has been exceedingly disrespectful to this body, to show any disrespect to it in turn, for I do not feel any. I think the action taken by the House, so far as we can criticise it, was taken without proper thought and proper consideration, and I think we ought to give the House an opportunity to correct it. I should be very much surprised if the House should insist upon the course which we all regard as disrespectful, whether they would so regard it or not; but if they have for this body the respect which this body entertains for that, I am sure they will try to avoid any conflict with even an erroneous opinion of this body as to how in a mere matter of courtesy we should proceed, for the members of that body and the members of this body and the members of every other legislative body must be of the opinion that, in order that there may be efficient and satisfactory legislation, there must be polite intercourse between the two bodies; there must be respectful consideration on the part of each body for the other; there must be no intentional giving of offense and no proceeding that is in the nature of an affront on the part of one body toward the other.

Therefore, I shall insist upon the motion of the Senator from Vermont being divided so that we may insist upon our amendments and send the bill back without agreeing to a conference, and then I think perhaps the House will give us a chance to have a full and free conference—a conference in which we can consider not only the amendments which they have agreed their conferees may consider, but also the ones which they have instructed their conferees not to consider, and that it may be free from any restriction or restraint.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I think the suggestions of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] seem to hit the case exactly, but it occurred to me that possibly we might very slightly vary the method which he has proposed, by simply making our insistence known, without adverting to what the House has done in its message, and that we might very properly pass this vote, that the Senate insists on its amendments and requests a conference, making an original request for a conference as if nothing had happened on that subject before, and then let the House agree to that if they see fit. That will end the whole thing and then this irregular proceeding drops. I think myself, personally, I should like that a great deal better, but I do not think it is of much importance.

Mr. FORAKER. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, if he will allow me, that I have no objection at all to accepting his suggestion. I merely made the suggestion I did as a way out of the difficulty.

Mr. HOAR. I will make that motion, if it be in order, as a substitute for that of the Senator from Vermont, or perhaps the Senator from Vermont will accept it.

Mr. PROCTOR. Yes.

Mr. HOAR. I move that the Senate insists on its amendments and ask the House for a free conference, the conferees to be appointed by the Chair.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, before the Senator from Massachusetts takes his seat, I was about to suggest this: That if we act as he has suggested, then the instructions of the House to their conferees stand.

Mr. HOAR. No; they would take a new action on our request for a free conference and let us know they have agreed to that.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not want the conferees of the House to come into conference feeling that they are bound by that previous action of the House, but I want them to come feeling that they are free from it.

Mr. LODGE. If I may ask a question, it is not proposed that we should appoint conferees, is it?

Mr. FORAKER. No.

Mr. LODGE. But simply that we ask for a free conference?

Mr. HOAR. That is all; a free conference.

Mr. LODGE. That we should insist on our amendments and ask for a free conference?

Mr. FORAKER. Yes.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. Presiden' I have been looking at this question, not in the light of my experience, because it has been too small, but by a reference to the book I notice one proceeding that I merely suggest; and that is that the Senate appoint a committee—not of conference in the ordinary sense—but a committee of conference for the purpose of considering the request of the House for a conference.

I notice that that has been done on several occasions in the Parliament of England. It is not an acceptance of the committee of conference, but it is a committee to confer with the House on the terms which they propose for a conference, instead of a committee of conference itself. I notice that that led to some good results on one or two occasions; and I merely suggest to the venerable Senators who have had experience on this subject that that might be a way out of this difficulty. If that is not done, the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] merely ignores the action of the House, which is not considered, according to the authorities, a respectful mode of proceeding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts as it is understood by the Chair, which is that the Senate insist on its amendments to House bill 12804 and ask for a full and free conference with the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon. That is what the Chair understands the motion to be.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I understand the situation of this bill to be that the Senate made sundry amendments to it and returned the bill to the House of Representatives without asking for a conference—a proper procedure. The House took up that bill, and whoever was in charge of it made a motion that the House disagree to the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. HALE. To all of them?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; to all of them, and ask the Senate for a conference on those amendments and those disagreements. Thereupon it was moved in the House that the conferees when appointed—I think that motion was made before the conferees were appointed—that those conferees, when appointed, should be instructed not to agree to certain amendments. With that instruction accompanying the bill the bill is now before the Senate.

What I fear respecting the motion made by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is that, if we wholly ignore—on that I agree with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS]—if we wholly ignore the usual request of the House for a conference, accompanied by an unusual proceeding on the part of the House, we may complicate the difficulty rather than unlock it.

I think it is fairly well understood in the parliamentary law and practice of these two Houses that either House can instruct itscon ferees in any particular manner. The form of that instruction, of course, is a matter for the House giving it to consider in the first instance, and the reason for that instruction, of course, can not be known here. The House say, in the preamble to the resolution they present to this House, that the Senate amendments are in violation of their rules. That may be a good reason for them, but it is not binding at all upon us. So we are now confronted with what we regard as a discourteous statement on their part as the reason they give for the passage of that resolution.

We are not to be disturbed by such resolutions, as it seems to me. As I understand our powers here, they are certainly coequal with the powers of the other House. There is no restraint upon our power of amendment that I know of. We can amend any bill that comes here as we choose to amend it, either under our rules or by unanimous consent. We had put on here the particular amendment—I do not wish to discuss the amendment—that is now in dispute, which was an amendment that was in violation of our rules, because it changed the existing law, but it was done without objection. Therefore, we can not raise that question, and certainly the House can not raise it as against us, because we do not allow them to deal with our rules any more than they allow us to deal with theirs.

So protesting, as I think we have a fair right to do, that this resolution is not in a form that is agreeable to us, and my judgment is—it may be taken for what it is worth—that we should, after this protest we are making, agree to the conference. Suppose we do agree to it. The conferees then meet, and the House conferees are confronted with their instructions, which they must in some way impart to our conferees.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not necessary that they shall impart them to our conferees because the House has imparted them to us.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. Then we have them now.

Mr. SPOONER. I should like to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. ALLISON. I shall be glad to answer it if I can.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from Iowa and I had a difference about some matter, which we never have had——

Mr. ALLISON. And I hope never will have.

Mr. SPOONER. And we never will have, and I invited him to a conference to determine whether we might not agree, and notified him that I was prepared to agree if he surrendered, and not otherwise, would he come?

Mr. ALLISON. I would, probably, feeling kindly, as I do, to the Senator, and I should say to him, "I will not refuse, certainly, to come and talk to you about this"——

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. ALLISON. "But I want you to understand in the beginning, if that is your attitude, there will be no change in our situation."

Mr. SPOONER. That is not this case. We understand it in the beginning. The Senator would come and shake hands with me——

Mr. ALLISON. I would.

Mr. SPOONER. And he would flatter me, and make me feel good, as he does everybody else——

Mr. ALLISON. I try to.

Mr. SPOONER. But that would be the end of it.

Mr. ALLISON. I would try to persuade the Senator. Suppose our conferees get into this conference. I take it we can trust almost any of our brethren here, especially do I think we can trust our distinguished neighbor, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR], to deal with this matter frankly and justly, and persistently, according to his own notion. I think he would.

Mr. SPOONER. How could the Senator from Vermont deal with it persistently when he knew before he was appointed on the conference committee that the House had instructed its conferees not to agree to a certain amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. There are several methods of doing it. In the first place, he could say what Mr. Reed, the ex-Speaker of the House, has often said, and what I believe is well understood, that when the House instructs its conferees and those conferees get into conference, it is still a full and free conference: that the conferees are not bound by those instructions, and that the House conferees, notwithstanding the instructions, if they are so minded, can act differently. They do not settle the question in conference. They settle it in the House when the conferees come back and make a report violating their instructions.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. ALLISON. I will.

Mr. SPOONER. I admit the right of the House to instruct its conferees. Has the Senator known, except within the last ten days, of a request for a conference accompanied by a message that the body requesting the conference had instructed its conferees not to recommend to it an agreement to a particular amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. I do not know of any instance prior to the last ten days, but that is a matter we can not avoid. I shared the prophecy of my friend the Senator from Maine the other day when he said this would not occur again. But it does not change the attitude of this proceeding, so far as the House is concerned, that they have notified us what they have done.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. HOAR. I wish to ask the Senator from Iowa a question, if I may?

Mr. ALLISON. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. It is whether this is a free conference and whether Speaker Reed's authority goes this far. Undoubtedly you may have a free conference, as in the case supposed by the Senator from Wisconsin in his question, when you have a resolution in your mind that you are never going to yield. That is a free conference still as between the conferees; and when the House instructs its conferees, that is a resolution in its own mind, and still so far Speaker Reed is undoubtedly right. But when you tell the other party that you are not going to yield ever, and that the party who is your organ in considering whether you shall yield has not any right to yield or to propose to yield, is that a free conference?

I did not mean, when I got up, to do more than to call the Senator's attention to a point, but perhaps he will allow me to state one sentence more, so that he can answer it. It seems to me that is the distinction, and that it is not a free conference which the House has asked.

Now, the Senator from Ohio proposed a motion which ignores, as the Senator from Iowa thinks mine does, the request of the House.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HOAR. He proposes to insist and say nothing about it. My proposition is to insist and to tell the House before we act upon their final proposition at all that we would like first a free conference. It does not seem to me to be disrespectful to them as ignoring what they ask. The free conferences precede, in the putting of motions, a motion to adhere, I believe. The more lenient proposition, if moved from the floor of either House, the proposition more likely to lead to an agreement, is always put before the stricter proposition. That is, you would put the motion to insist before you put the motion to adhere, if I am not mistaken in my memory.

I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to this point: Has the House invited us to a free conference, and does Mr. Reed's expression, which is undoubtedly true, that an instruction to its own agent, kept in its own bosom—as we are not supposed to know what happens in the House—apply in this case? That is what I want to put to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. ALLISON. I do; but I had a pretty long question put to me by the Senator from Massachusetts which I should like to answer.

Mr. FORAKER. I would not interrupt the Senator from Iowa at this point, knowing he wants to answer the question of the Senator from Massachusetts, if it were not for the fact that while this discussion has been going on I have been trying to consult authorities on the subject, and I believe I have found a case precisely in point, occurring in the House, in complete support of the motion made by the Senator from Massachusetts and a way out of this difficulty.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Ohio has such a case I shall be glad to know it.

Mr. FORAKER. As I understand it, it is, and I thought the Senator would be glad to have the benefit of it.

I read from paragraph 1381 of House Documents, volume 80, No. 576, Parliamentary Precedents of House, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, 1897–98:

On March 2, 1891, Mr. E. H. Funston—

We have recently heard that name here—

of Kansas, as a privileged question, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. 13552) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, reported that they had been unable to agree.

The Speaker laid before the House the following resolution of the Senate:

"Resolved, That the Senate insist upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 13552) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1892, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, including the amendment numbered 17, referred to in the message from the House, and agree to a free conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon."

Then Mr. Funston submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the House ask for a free conference."

After debate, Mr. Robert M. La Follette, of Wisconsin, moved that the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and agree to the same. After further debate, Mr. La Follete withdrew the motion.

The question recurring on agreeing to the resolution of Mr. Funston, the previous question was ordered, and under the operation thereof the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CANNON submitted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is the sense of the House of Representatives that said conference shall not agree to the amendment of the Senate numbered 17."

Mr. Funston made the point of order that, being in direct conflict with the resolution just adopted, the resolution submitted by Mr. CANNON was not in order.

The Speaker sustained the point of order, and the resolution was not received.

That, as I understand it, is a complete support of the motion which has been made by the Senator from Massachusetts. The only difference between the cases is that there the trouble originated in the Senate in sending instructions to the House instead of the House instructing its conferees in the way indicated.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not read that quite as the Senator from Ohio reads it. After the conference was ordered in that case, which was a full and free conference, then Mr. CANNON undertook to have the House instruct the conferees, and as I understand that case as read by the Senator the Speaker ruled that it was inconsistent with the former resolution and therefore not in order. Of course that is leather and prunella.

The question with which we are confronted is, what we shall do now to show to the other body that we do not take kindly to their asking of us a conference and before we agree to it instructing their conferees what they shall do at that conference. That is an unusual proceeding, as I understand the authorities. But it is a proceeding that either House may engage in, I understand. Although it is exceptional, it has been done.

My objection to the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts is that if we intend to show the House that we disagree with them as respects their power and right to notify us of these instructions I think we should do it in some other form than by ignoring a resolution which has come to us from the House. I think that is true, and it applies as well, in my judgment, to the proposition of the Senator from Ohio as it does to the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. FORAKER rose.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator from Ohio will allow me a moment more, the prime object of the two Houses must be to do whatever can be done to facilitate the passage of bills that are necessary to carry on the Government. That is the primary object. Whatever the House may do, that is our primary duty. It is so to act, judiciously and fairly, preserving the dignity and the privileges of the Senate, as, if we can, to bring the two Houses together upon the Army appropriation bill. In order to do that, it seems to me, having made a protest against the action of the House, we can reach this end very well by agreeing to the conference and trusting our conferees to deal with this question when they get into conference with the House.

I do not know what our conferees will do, but if I were a conferee I should say to the conferees on the part of the House, "Gentlemen, you seem to be handicapped here, and until we are all upon a par, we must have a disagreement, not only upon the amendment about which you speak, but upon every other amendment." Then the two Houses would be in disagreement, and they can untangle and unravel this thing without any trouble, unless it is the purpose of one or the other of the Houses to have a quarrel, and that bodes no good to the interests we all have at stake in passing these bills, which must be passed through at this session of Congress.

I am willing to adopt any suggestion that can be made, but it seems to be we should have a care that we do not, in presenting resolutions upon this subject, get ourselves into further difficulty.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator from Iowa yield for one moment to a question?

Mr. ALLISON. I will.

Mr. COCKRELL. Many other amendments were made by the Senate to the Army appropriation bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Many.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will not all the other amendments be in a free conference?

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose they will.

Mr. COCKRELL. Necessarily so.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Missouri allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COCKRELL. Wait until I get through questioning and then I will answer your question. Now, when the conference committee have met and they have agreed upon some and disagreed upon other items, this amendment is disagreed to. Does not the House have to consider and vote upon it?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. COCKRELL. Necessarily so.

Mr. ALLISON. As we do.

Mr. COCKRELL. As we do the same. So it does not preclude any final action. When it comes back to the House the House can move to agree to the amendments, just as we can move to recede from the amendment. They can do that, can they not?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly.

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly. If they were to move to agree to the amendment that would set aside this resolution.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course. It may be a long road or a short one, but it is a proper road to travel——

Mr. COCKRELL. Certainly.

Mr. ALLISON. And one that has often been traveled before.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Iowa allow me to ask the Senator from Missouri a question?

Mr. ALLISON. I yield the floor.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not want the floor. If this resolution, passed by the House of Representatives and sent to us with the request for a full and free conference, had embraced all the amendments proposed by the Senate——

Mr. COCKRELL. That is not a debatable proposition.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a debatable proposition.

Mr. COCKRELL. Not at all.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a debatable proposition, because if the House has a right to make such an instruction in limine, and to send it to us as to one amendment, it has the right to do it as to all.

Mr. COCKRELL. That would mean there would be no legislation; that is all.

Mr. SPOONER. Why?

Mr. COCKRELL. I do not presume the House would ever take such a position. I suppose it is a reasonable legislative body, and that is not a supposable case.

I did not rise to make a speech upon this question. In my judgment, beyond any question the House has the technical right to pass an instruction, and I do not see that it makes much difference, except as a mere matter of courtesy, whether that is done before it has been thrown into conference or after; and I hold that the Senate has the right to instruct. I remember only a few years ago when the Senate did take a very decided position. While they did not act openly upon it, the Senate Committee on Appropriations very frankly told the members of the House conference committee that there would be no legislation until the amendment was agreed to. It was to pay the clerks of Senators, and in the end it was agreed to. The House had been refusing to agree to pay the clerks of Senators or to make any appropriation for them, and the Senate took that position. It was a controversy which extended for a little while; but it came to an end, as all those things must come to an end.

Mr. TELLER. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri that that was simply what is done frequently in conference. That is quite a different thing from the House instructing its agents that they shall not confer upon a subject. At this conference, if it is appointed, under the motion of the Senator from Vermont, the House members will be precluded from any discussion of this one amendment, if they pay attention to their instructions.

Mr. COCKRELL. The great trouble seems to be that the House has sent us a copy of the instructions. If they had them to themselves there would not have been a word said about it.

Mr. TELLER. If they had done that, I suppose it would have been within the precedents. It would not have seemed quite so discourteous as this proceeding seems to be.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to call his attention to a case in the volume cited by the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TELLER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. I will read it.

On February 28, 1891, the House was considering the bill (H. R. 10881) to amend the laws relating to copyrights, with amendments of the Senate thereto, and a request for a conference with the House on the bill and amendments.

Mr. William E. Simonds, of Connecticut, moved that the House nonconcur in the Senate amendments and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The House voted to nonconcur and agreed to the conference. Thereupon Mr. Lewis E. Payson, of Illinois, submitted the following resolution of instructions to the conferees:

"Resolved, That the conference committee be instructed to insist on inserting upon the bill in conference the principles involved in the following bill." [Here followed the text of a new bill.]

Mr. Simonds made the point of order against the instructions proposed: First, that these instructions, if adopted, would do away with the sole text of the bill, to which both Houses had already agreed, and were not permissible under the practice and the precedents of the House. Again, that it was not permissible to instruct the conferees in the first instance and before they had met and disagreed.

The Speaker sustained the point of order.

Mr. TELLER. Who was the Speaker?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. Reed. Then there was a first conference, which was a full and free conference, and a disagreement reported. Then follows the case cited by the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TELLER. Each House is a judge for itself of what is courteous and proper. No law ever has been made, and I suppose none could be made, that could bind them in matters of that kind, but there ought to be no proceeding which can be considered by the other body as disrespectful. When a body, the House of Representatives or the Senate, appoints conferees for the first time and then says to them, "You are to stand against this particular amendment or these certain amendments and allow the bill to fail rather than yield," I think that is discourteous and disrespectful treatment of the other body.

I think you might just as well start in and determine what is the right of the House and what is ours. Of course I do not care about referring to what occurred in the House, but I looked over the proceedings, and it seems to me the real controversy is that we have not the right to make amendments; that if we put on an amendment which interferes with the statute it is a violation of the rules of propriety. We have done that a hundred times since I have been in the Senate. We have set aside statutes by provisions in appropriation bills and other bills. I believe the wise thing would be in some way to get into conference with the House as to their rights and as to ours. I think this matter ought to go to some committee like the Committee on Appropriations or the Committee on Rules and a courteous statement be made to the House of what we think is due us and what we are going to insist upon in the future.

Now, when the House voted not to accept our amendments it was an instruction enough, it seems to me, to the conferees at least for the time being. I know that sometimes when there has been a controversy lasting for some time between conference committees both bodies have given instructions either to recede or to adhere. But what I am particularly interested in is to get some ruling which shall not allow these things to be done in the future. The other day we had the same thing. We were told then that the attention of the House having been called to it we probably would not have any more trouble of this kind. Here within a week comes another. I believe if the motion of the Senator from Vermont is accepted you will have this thing repeated indefinitely, and it will be a source of continual friction between the House and the Senate, a source of continual irritation, I may say, and ill will, and in some way we ought to bring the matter to a head.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] said if the House had not sent this instruction over to us nothing would have been heard of it. The sending of it over to us is the entire point, as it seems to me. They have a right to instruct their conferees; we have a right to instruct our conferees; but when the House by solemn message say to us as the Senate that they will not accept a given amendment or a number of given amendments the full and free conference is at an end. It does not matter whether it is an amendment of one word or whether it is every amendment offered. It is the principle. If they send us a message to that effect, a full and free conference is at an end.

There is more than that. The point to which the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] has called attention—the right of the Senate to amend—is involved, in my judgment, in this controversy. If we keep on yielding to messages from the House, as we yielded the other day, we shall soon find our entire right of amendment questioned whenever the House does not happen to fancy any particular amendment which we put on. We had the case the other day, and Senators wiser and more experienced than I said it was an unprecedented thing and that it was better not to take notice of it; that it never would happen again. We followed that advice, and the matter went into conference. We took no notice of it, and within ten days the unprecedented thing happens again. If we do not meet it at the threshold, we shall have to meet it in a very short time in a much worse form.

It seems to me we ought to take up this question through our Committee on Rules, which is the organ of procedure of the Senate, and discuss the question with the House as to this matter of general instructions sent in the form of a message to the Senate. I think we ought to have that decided. I care nothing about the amendment involved in this particular case, but I think we ought to have that broad question decided. If the House is going to send a message to us saying "We will not take an amendment that you have put on," the day is not far distant when the Senate will begin to send messages of a similar kind to the House, and there you breed deadlocks and controversies, when the very object of our rules and of all parliamentary law is to bring the two Houses to an agreement.

I hope, Mr. President, that we shall adopt either the motion made by my colleague or do what I myself think would be much better. I advance the idea with hesitation, but I think it would be better to refer this question to our Committee on Rules to take up and report to the Senate, and to ask, perhaps, a conference with the House on the question of one House sending instructions to the other body notifying the other body beforehand that they will not agree in a conference.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator yield to a question?

Mr. LODGE. With pleasure.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would not that revive the old celebrated question that came up in the First Congress between the Senate and the House and which consumed a vast deal of time in discussion as to how messages should be sent from the Senate to the House and from the House to the Senate? Would it not open that old question of courtesy between the two Houses and the reports made upon it as to how the messages of the House should be delivered to the Senate and how the Senate should send messages to the House and all that? It seems to me that it would revive the old question which took Congress a good long while to decide as to how the two Houses would communicate with each other.

Mr. LODGE. It is perfectly easy as to how the Houses shall communicate with each other. The question is whether in asking conferences either House in instructing its conferees shall notify the other body beforehand that it will not agree to a specified amendment. If that is to be the practice, it must be the practice for us as it is for them. We do not want it to be the practice. We hope we can get them to agree that it shall not be the practice. We hope that action shall be taken, as before in the House and in the Senate, in regard to conferees, and not have one body send a formal notice to the other body that no agreement is possible. It is as bad as a motion to adhere.

Mr. PETTUS. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that this is not only telling us that they will not agree to anything, if it stopped at that it would possibly be bearable, but it tells us "You have no right to put it on."

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; it goes much further than that.

Mr. PETTUS. It seems to me we ought to have a conference on the message.

Mr. SPOONER. I think that is right.

Mr. CULLOM. Now, what is the motion?

Mr. BATE. Meanwhile what is going to become of the motion of the Senator from Vermont?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont allowed the Senator from Massachusetts to present a motion as a substitute for his, and the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts is that the Senate insist upon its amendments to the bill and ask for a full and free conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. LODGE. Then, as a substitute to the motion of my colleague, I move that the message of the House which accompanied the Army appropriation bill be referred to the Committee on Rules to consider and to report, and if necessary to confer with the other House in regard to it.

Mr. HOAR. That motion is not in order technically. That is not one of the motions which can be made when a measure is pending. It will have to be an independent resolution of itself, leaving this matter still untouched and undisposed of. My colleague might move to commit the bill with all the pending motions to such a committee.

Mr. LODGE. Very well; that is better. I move, then, to commit the bill and the message of the House and all pending motions to the Committee on Rules.

Mr. FORAKER. I hope the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] will insist upon his motion. I believe it is the best way out of this difficulty. It does not seem to me possible that the House will hesitate to respond favorably to a respectful request of the Senate for a conference. I think it is the best way to meet the message, which we regard as disrespectful. We simply ignore it. It is not necessary to have a controversy about it. If this matter is referred to the Committee on Rules for that committee to take up and consider, you will give rise to a parliamentary inquiry and parliamentary questions about which we may be debating here for nobody knows how long. I think the best way is simply to ask the House for a full and free conference on the bill and pay no attention to the message.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to have the motion of the senior Senator from Massachusetts read again.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to say in just one word that the point of the authority I cited a moment ago was just that. That is all the House did. They asked for a conference.

Mr. LODGE. I have no desire to press the motion for a reference to the committee. My object is to avoid assenting to a conference on the present terms, and the sooner we bring it to an end the better. I withdraw my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his motion.

Mr. FORAKER. I quite agree with the junior Senator from Massachusetts in that respect. If our request should not be favorably acted upon, we can then, if necessary, resort to this further action which has been suggested. I think the simplest and easiest way out of it is to adopt the motion made by the senior Senator from Massachusetts.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The junior Senator from Massachusetts withdraws his motion to commit the bill with the message and the motions to the Committee on Rules, and the question is on the motion submitted by the senior Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. TELLER. Let it be read.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the senior Senator from Massachusetts what he proposes to do with the message that accompanied the bill from the House. What motion, if any, does he make respecting that, or does he ignore it?

Mr. HOAR. I do not understand that we make the motion upon a message which comes from the House here as such. That is not the way we make the motion. The motion is one of the motions that is in order in a certain stage of the bill. I suppose that it ignores the message, of course, just as the motion of the Senator from Ohio that we insist and say nothing about it ignored the message. Suppose the House had asked us something else? Suppose the House had asked us to join them in services in commemorating any public event—the Fourth of July—on a certain day and at a certain time in their Chamber, and without saying anything about joining in that celebration of the House we asked the House for a conference on that subject? When we ask for a conference, whether free or otherwise, we are not bound either to dissent or assent from the thing we are conferring upon. The House sent here in substance a message saying that "we have disagreed to your amendments," and ask for a kind of a conference which, in our judgment, is not free. Without saying anything about having a kind of conference which in our judgment is not free, we send over to the House a message saying, "We ask you to give us a free conference," leaving the message of the House in abeyance until we hear what comes of the free conference. It seems to me that there is no parliamentary difficulty about the proposition.

Mr. ALLISON. I did not ask my question with a view of suggesting a parliamentary difficulty. I was wondering what the House might say to our message, we ignoring theirs.

Mr. HOAR. I should think from the experience of the last two weeks whatever happens we may well wonder what the House will think. Nobody can tell about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the senior Senator from Massachusetts. [Putting the question.] In the opinion of the Chair the ayes have it.

Mr. PETTUS. If that motion is to be put, I would want to move an amendment to it. I want it to say "in reply to the message from the House," and then follow the motion as made. I want it for an answer, sir. I do not think the Senate ought to ignore the message of the House and add rudeness to rudeness.

Mr. HOAR. It does not seem to me that it is rudeness. It seems to me that when we are asking for a free conference on the situation and everything we want to have that free conference before we decide on the message. We do not say whether we will assent or dissent. It is a preceding step. The House has sent us a message, and we reply that we would like to talk the matter over with you freely. That is all there is of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the Chair not having announced which way the vote was, I should like to have the motion or resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts read, so that we may vote more generally, or have the yeas and nays, if necessary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to be that the Senate insists upon its amendments to the Army appropriation bill and asks a full and free conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon. That is what the Chair understands the motion to be.

Mr. HOAR. That is it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then I should like to have some further light as to whether that would be notice to the House that their request for a conference is not for a full and free conference, but one under limitations.

Mr. CULLOM. That is exactly what it means.

Mr. TILLMAN. We simply return to them a message without any action, and ask for a full and free conference; and if they do not grant that then we will consider their message and take such further steps as will subserve the purposes of maintaining Senatorial dignity and right.

Mr. SPOONER. The way it stands is this: The Senator asked for light.

Mr. TILLMAN. I want light.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not sure that I can give it to the Senator, but the way it seems to me, and I may need light myself, is this: The House insists upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments, and asks for a conference. In reply to that we send back to them a message that we insist upon our amendments, and ask for a conference.

Mr. TILLMAN. But did not the House instruct its conferees?

Mr. SPOONER. I am not speaking of that. I am speaking about the parliamentary situation.

Mr. TILLMAN. It seems a little tangled.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the way it stands.

I have a notion, Mr. President, that the Senator from Alabama [Mr. PETTUS] has the true solution of this difficulty, and he finds authority for it in the parliamentary proceeding of England.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama will prepare any amendment to the motion he may desire.

Mr. SPOONER. In a situation of this kind we appoint a committee, pending the action of the Senate on the message of the House, to confer with the House as to the privileges and rights of the two Houses.

Mr. LODGE. That is the motion I proposed.

Mr. FORAKER. The suggestion, and it has been repeated, is based upon the idea that in adopting the motion made by the senior Senator from Massachusetts we are not making answer to the House message. I think that is a mistake. I think we are answering it. The House sends us a message and this is our answer to it. We want a full and free conference. It is not necessary for us to specify that we send you this in answer to your message, in answer to your letter of instructions, and your letter communicating to us knowledge of your rules by which you are bound. It is not necessary for us to specify that that is the office of the communication we send. That will, necessarily, be so understood. They have asked for a full and free conference, and at the same time have sent us a message which reveals the fact that they have denied to us a full and free conference. Three of the amendments they have instructed their conferees not to agree with us about. Now, we simply answer in a polite, reasonable way, requesting a full and free conference. It seems to me that that will unravel the whole difficulty, for I can not believe that the House will hesitate to grant a full and free conference.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me to say that that ignores, so far as the Senate is concerned, absolutely the request of the House. Does the Senator think that is calculated to promote harmony?

Mr. FORAKER. I differ from the Senator when he says that that ignores it. I do not think it is an ignoring of it. I do not think that we have to refer to it in specific terms in order to answer it. They send us this request and we send back a message that we want a full and free conference.

Mr. HOAR. May I suggest to the Senator right there that it is the common practice. The House sends over a bill and requests for it the assent of the Senate. We send back a request asking for a conference before we decide whether we assent to it or not. We have a perfect right to do it. It is not ignoring anything. It is the common way of stating that on the whole situation, as we understand it, we would like to talk it over with you. That is the whole of it.

Mr. FORAKER. I am obliged to the Senator for his suggestion. There can not possibly be any misunderstanding of our message from the fact that it has direct relation to the communication they have made to the Senate, and it does seem to me to be the surest way to avoid any friction or lack of harmony in this proceeding. But on this we are lacking in harmony just now, and we do not want to make it worse.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Ohio will allow the Chair to state the condition of the motion. The Chair put the question and called for the ayes and noes, and not being able to decide, debate sprung up. The Chair will put the motion again, if it is desired.

Mr. TILLMAN. I should like to ask for a little more light before I vote.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I think the hour of 2 o'clock has arrived.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] gave notice that he would speak to-day, and he has waited very patiently during the whole morning hour. I hope nothing more will be done to prevent him from taking the floor.

Mr. TILLMAN. We will wait and get light in the morning.

Mr. CULLOM. On Monday morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair at this time, with the permission of the Senator from Idaho, will lay before the Senate some matters on its table.

Mr. DUBOIS. Certainly.

STATUTES OF LIMITATIONS IN CERTAIN LAND CASES.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 4264) providing that the statutes of limitations of the several States shall apply as a defense to actions brought in any courts for the recovery of lands patented under the treaty of May 10, 1854, between the United States of America and the Shawnee tribe of Indians."

The amendments were, on page 1, to strike out all after line 6, down to and including "Indians," in line 9, and to insert "any tribe of Indians under any treaty between it and the United States of America."

On page 2, line 4, to strike out "the" and insert "any."

On page 2, line 5, to strike out "Shawnee."

And to amend the title so as to read: "An act providing that the statute of limitations of the several States shall apply as a defense to actions brought in the United States courts for the recovery of lands patented in severalty to members of any tribe of Indians under any treaty between it and the United States of America."

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14018) to increase the limit of cost of certain public buildings, to authorize the purchase of sites for public buildings, to authorize the erection and completion of public buildings, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. FAIRBANKS. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the request of the House for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. FAIRBANKS, Mr. WARREN, and Mr. RAWLINS were appointed.

FOOD ADULTERATION, ETC.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9960) to prevent a false branding or marking of food and dairy products as to the State or Territory in which they are made or produced, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and accede to the request of the House of Representatives for a conference.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the Presiding Officer was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. MCLAURIN of South Carolina, and Mr. HARRIS were appointed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. B. F. BARNES, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on the 22d instant approved and signed the act (S. 3439) to amend an act entitled "An act to license billiard and pool tables in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the President of the United States had on this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. 2951) granting an increase of pension to Maria J. Wilson; and

An act (S. 1295) to amend an act authorizing the construction of a railway, street railway, motor, wagon, and pedestrian bridge over the Missouri River near Council Bluffs, Iowa, and Omaha, Nebr., approved February 13, 1891, and amended by an act approved January 28, 1893, and by an act approved April 21, 1898, and to authorize the Omaha Bridge and Terminal Railway Company, successor to the Interstate Bridge and Street Railway Company, to complete, reconstruct, and change a bridge for railway, street railway, vehicle, pedestrian, and other highway purposes over the Missouri River, near Council Bluffs, Iowa, and Omaha, Nebr.

CIVIL GOVERNMENT FOR THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 2295) temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, there are two propositions before the Senate, and we are called upon to decide for the people of the United States which one we will indorse by our votes.

One is presented by the majority of the Committee on the Philippines, representing the views of the Republicans, the other by the minority of that committee, reflecting the views of the Democrats of this Chamber.

It is quite likely that the majority proposition does not meet the approval of all the Republicans and that the minority substitute is not satisfactory to all the Democrats. It is quite certain, however, that the policy outlined in the majority bill is satisfactory to the Republicans, as the policy marked out in the minority bill is satisfactory to the Democrats in the Senate.

The main question is as to which policy we shall adopt in dealing with the Philippine Archipelago. This is the question, then, which the two bills plainly present.

The difference is so clear and well defined that no one here or elsewhere need be in doubt.

For the very first time the question is plainly submitted to the people of the country and their verdict is asked.

Let me state the difference in simple language between the policy of the Republicans and Democrats before entering into an argument.

The Republicans intend to hold the Philippines subject to the United States in all things, without giving any hope, much less a promise, of ultimate independence. So far as anywhere appears, the Filipinos are to remain a colony of the United States for all time to come. For the immediate present, and for the indefinite future, all of their possessions, lands, timber, mines, and waterways are to be parceled out to our own people under such restrictions only as we ourselves shall impose. The Filipinos are to have no voice in the disposal of their own. They are to be taxed as we will, but have nothing to say as to the disposition of the taxes collected. After we have become satiated, after we have exploited the country, we are at liberty to remain or to leave as seems best to us. Our own wishes are to guide and control our future actions. There is nothing in the policy of the Republicans which is anywhere apparent to indicate that the wishes or desires of the Filipinos are to be taken into consideration now or in the future.

The policy of the Democrats is to give the Filipinos an independent government at the earliest practicable moment. This is clearly set forth and solemnly guaranteed. In the meantime, and until the Filipinos establish such a government for themselves as is suitable to their conditions, we propose to keep and protect their country and their possessions for their own use.

The contrast between the two policies is sharp and well defined. There can be no such thing as mistaking the difference between the two propositions before you. The majority intend to hold the islands for all time as a colony. The minority intend to give them an independent government as soon as possible. The majority intend immediately, and in the future, to exploit the islands for the advantage and gain of our own people. The minority intend to hold the archipelago for the Filipinos, and turn it over to them when they have established a government of their own.

I shall endeavor to demonstrate that I have correctly stated the difference as to the policy between the two parties, as shown in the two bills before us, although I am not certain that anyone objects to the accuracy of my comparison.

I take the bill of the majority. Its title is "A bill temporarily to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes." There certainly is nothing in that title to hold out any hope of independent government for the Filipinos, and nowhere in the bill do you find any language conveying any more hope. Who is to provide for the administration of the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands? It is plainly set forth in all the succeeding sections of the bill that the United States is to administer the affairs of civil government of the Philippine Islands, utterly regardless of the wishes, suggestions, or protests of the inhabitants of the islands.

There is no intimation anywhere in the bill that at any time in the future or under any circumstances will the United States cease to administer the affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands. It must be assumed, then, and can not be controverted, dodged, or evaded, that the United States intends to make a perpetual colony of these islands. No Republican Senator has denied this in this debate, and some have exultingly proclaimed it.

The title of the bill is "temporarily to provide for the administration of affairs of civil government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes." Let us see what some of the other purposes are.

Section 5 of the bill provides for the taking of a census. Section 6 of the bill says:

That after the report of such census the Philippine Commission shall fully report to the President and to Congress their recommendations based upon such census and upon the operation of the local governments hereinafter provided for, whether or not all or certain of the Philippine Islands are capable, fit, and ready for the establishment of a permanent popular representative government.

There is nothing in this section which would compel Congress to act. They are simply to report to the President and Congress their recommendations, and there is nothing in the section which says it shall be a permanent popular representative government of the Philippines or an independent government. They simply report to Congress, giving Congress the power to act if they want to do so. There is nothing compelling Congress to act, and it does not intimate in the slightest degree that an independent government is to be given.

Section 7 confers certain powers on the Philippine Commission which are no greater than the powers already conferred on that Commission. They are about the same, certainly not greater, in the light of the contention I make, which is that there is nothing in the bill or in the utterances of Senators looking to the independence of those islands.

Section 13 authorizes the government of the Philippines to lease, let, and demise to actual occupants and settlers and others, for a term of not more than five years, such parts of the public domain other than timber and mineral lands of the United States in the Philippine Islands as it may deem wise, not exceeding 160 acres, or its equivalent in hectares, to any one person, nor more than 5,000 acres to any corporation or association of persons.

I call attention to that to emphasize the fact that we are doing there what we have never been able to do in the United States. As one of the representatives in the other branch of Congress and in this of a portion of the Western section of the country, I have been confronted with this proposition many times. It is now in the air that some Senators favor the leasing of public lands; but Congress has never shown the slightest disposition to lease public lands in large tracts. We can demonstrate at any time that such a policy always has been and always will be very injurious to the country. Yet in the Philippine Islands we make provision for the leasing of lands in tracts of 5,000 acres.

The mineral-land provision of the bill is a most excellent one. It is all right as a law for the United States, and it is almost identical with our own mineral-land law, but its effect will be to encourage foreign people to take possession of these mineral lands against the wishes of their true owners. As a section it is all right, but my contention is that we ought not to adopt such a provision for the Philippine Islands, to take the mineral lands away from those people and allow our own people to take them.

On page 41 of the bill will be found section 68, which provides for the issuance of bonds for betterments and improvements in municipalities, etc. Who is to decide whether it will be wise to issue bonds for such improvements or not?

Mr. SPOONER. Does it not define the purposes for which the bonds are to be issued?

Mr. DUBOIS. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. What are they?

Mr. DUBOIS. I will read the section:

SEC. 68. That for the purpose of providing funds to construct sewers, to furnish adequate sewer and drainage facilities, to secure a sufficient supply of water, and to provide all kinds of municipal betterments and improvements in municipalities, the government of the Philippine Islands, under such limitations, terms, and conditions as it may prescribe, with the consent and approval of the President of the United States, may permit any municipality of said islands to incur indebtedness, borrow money, and to issue and sell (at not less than par value) registered or coupon bonds in such amount and payable at such time as may be determined by the government of the Philippines, with interest thereon not to exceed 5 per cent per annum.

Then there is this proviso to the section:

Provided, That the entire indebtedness of any municipality under this provision shall not exceed 5 per cent of the assessed valuation of the property in said municipality, and any obligation in excess of such limit shall be null and void.

Who is to determine whether bonds shall be issued and for what purposes? The white men or the foreigners who are there exploiting the country will be the ones who will reach the ears of the Commission. There will not be an improvement made or a bond issued at the suggestion of the natives themselves. It is so in regard to Manila, where we allow the municipality to borrow $4,000,000 in addition to what these other municipalities are allowed to borrow. The American Chamber of Commerce, the exploiters, and the foreigners who are there exploiting that country will be the ones who will determine whether or not these bonds are to be issued; it will not be the Filipinos, because they are given no voice under this bill in the management of their own affairs or in the disposition of their own property.

Here is a long section in regard to franchises offering extraordinary inducements to foreigners to go there—franchises for cutting timber, for building electric railroads and steam railroads, and for acquiring mineral lands. The majority of the committee in their report say:

The committee feel that it is of the greatest importance for the proper development of the islands that capital be encouraged to enter the islands.

So there is no disguising the fact they want capital to go there.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] presented a petition from Mr. H. L. Wheatley, representing certain business interests of Chicago and New York. He makes a long argument, and I will ask to have it printed, without reading, as a part of my remarks.

The paper referred to is as follows:

[Senate Document No. 306, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.]

Mr. LODGE presented the following petition of Mr. H. L. Wheatley, representing certain business interests of Chicago and New York, praying that Senate bill 2295 be changed so as to allow corporations to own and control 20,000 instead of 5,000 acres of land in the Philippine Islands:

The Committee on the Philippine Islands, United States Senate.

SIRS: Your petitioner was formerly a resident of the State of Illinois, but for the past three years has been in the Philippine Islands, representing a syndicate of Chicago and New York gentlemen seeking investments in plantation and railway enterprises. Having traveled over 5,000 miles in the archipelago and studied the conditions existing there, your petitioner realizes the vast importance, from a business standpoint, of the two bills now before the Congress, known as S. 2295 and H. R. 9725, and would respectfully call the attention of your honorable body to what your petitioner considers serious defects in said S. bill 2295; defects which, if not remedied, will continue the present serious business stagnation in the islands and effectually stop the investment of American capital, thus, for years to come, leaving the islands in their present backward state, with their vast natural resources undeveloped.

The Philippine Islands to-day, after over three hundred years of Spanish occupation, contain more undeveloped arable lands, in proportion to size, than any other tropical country in the Far East, and to develop even a fraction of this vast area, estimated at nearly 80,000,000 acres of agricultural lands, will require the most liberal inducements to planters by the Government, whether acting singly or by association with others as corporate bodies. In spite of this, a fact well known to any business man in the Far East familiar with the subject, section 13 of S. 2295 prohibits the leasing of lands by the Government for more than five years, and not to exceed 5,000 acres to any corporation or association of persons, and section 77 prohibits any corporation organized to engage in agricultural pursuits from owning or controlling more than 5,000 acres of land.

If section 13 is passed and becomes a law, the Commission having no power to sell lands, it will be impossible to enlist capital to lease and start development of any public lands in the islands. All forms of tropical agriculture require a large outlay of money before any returns may be expected, as even the quick-maturing crops (a planter starting with raw land) require from eighteen months to two and one-half years before returns can be had, and at a cost of $75 to $150 per acre, to say nothing of the planter's time and living expenses.

It may be argued that section 11 covers this point by allowing the Commissioners to "make rules and regulations for the lease, sale, or other disposition of the public lands," but such "rules and regulations," if framed by the Commission before the next ensuing session of Congress, do not help the matter any, for the Congress may disapprove the "rules and regulations" so made, thus putting off indefinitely any further opportunity to acquire the necessary lands either by purchase or extension of lease, and no sane man will invest his money under such unsatisfactory and unstable conditions.

It is not reasonable to suppose that, with the vast area of cultivable lands in the islands, companies or associations would attempt to lease lands other than lands they expected to ultimately use in their development work, and the experience of England and Holland in their equally fertile tropical colonies proves conclusively that inducements rather than restrictions are essential to influence men with the necessary capital to develop their resources. Even were the term on leased lands limited to ninety-nine years, and the amount of land held by any one company unlimited by law, your petitioner feels safe in asserting that leaseholds aggregating less than 1,000,000 acres would be the maximum during the next ten years, and your petitioner does not believe it possible that even that figure would be reached, for that would mean the formation of 50 corporations leasing 20,000 acres of land each, with a necessary capital of $200,000,000, an unprecedented and improbable hypothesis.

From personal experience and observation your petitioner is prepared to prove that it is impossible for an agricultural corporation to successfully (from a financial point of view) produce many of the products of the Philippines if their holdings are limited to 5,000 acres of land. The expenses for buildings, mills, machinery, and management are practically the same with 5,000 acres under cultivation as with 20,000 acres, and the experience of the sugar planters in Hawaii goes to prove this. Here in the Philippines, with vast sections of lands as they were since known by man, where the expense of even making the journey to inspect them is an insurmountable obstacle to the average citizen dependent upon his own resources, it is proposed to restrict the holdings of corporations composed of not one large but many small investors, who would have no other way to invest their money in the islands, to an acreage which has been proven to be too small to return to investors adequate returns upon their money, the investment of which is so far removed from their personal attention, and an investment in which they have to rely so entirely upon the integrity and ability of their brother man.

In the Hawaiian Islands to-day the successful plantations, such as Oahu, Ewa, Wailua, Hawaiian Commercial Company, Waimea, Olaa, Hakalau, Puna, and many others which your petitioner can mention, are paying investments with from 10,000 to 20,000 acres each, while many if not all of the smaller plantations are either losing propositions or are just holding their own, hoping almost against hope for a raise in the price of sugar to put them again upon a paying basis. These large plantations are not owned by one nor by a dozen men, but the stock is held by many thousands of small investors, who thus reap the advantages of combination it would be impossible to obtain were they to attempt it each man for himself, and your petitioner feels safe in saying that with this provision a law the further development in these islands of sugar, copra, cocoa, hemp, tobacco, rubber, and other tropical products will be greatly retarded if not absolutely destroyed.

The conditions governing the development of lands in tropical countries is so entirely different from our own, either in our thickly settled Eastern States or upon the broad and fertile prairies of the West, that were the laws governing the settlement of lands in the Philippines the same as in the States the islands would be in the primitive condition they are to-day one hundred years hence. The average agricultural native would not know what to do with 160 acres of land if he had it, and would make no attempt to cultivate more of it than would bring in sufficient to sustain the meager necessities of his family and himself, while to the average homesteader of the United States or any European country there is no other place on earth where failure is more certain. That this latter condition applies to all tropical countries no man who has made a study of the conditions necessary to successful tropical agriculture will deny.

Your petitioner would further call the attention of your honorable body to section 16 in the proposed bill. Were this section to be literally construed it would confine all future agricultural operations to three or four valleys in the islands, thus leaving undeveloped practically all of the island of Mindoro, the greater part of the beautiful island of Mindanao, and millions of acres of lands in other islands, in which the clearing away of a part of the timber would not only be of no financial loss to the Government, but would be of decided improvement in the healthfulness of the surrounding country. The east, south, and west coasts of Mindanao are practically a virgin forest to the water's edge, and to make possible the development of the wonderful agricultural possibilities of this island your petitioner would respectfully suggest that some latitude be allowed the authorities who are on the ground and so thoroughly understand and recognize the importance of this matter.

Your petitioner would further respectfully represent that the lack of laws for the disposition of the public lands, the granting of franchises, and the disposal of other matters of a public or semipublic nature has already had a most deplorable effect. The interest taken in the Philippines by investors of every class, from the man with his few hundred of dollars to the large investor with his millions, has changed considerably in the past two years. It is a difficult matter even under the most favorable conditions to interest capital in a country so remote from our own shores as the Philippine Islands, and with legislation which deters rather than encourages or induces the investing public it is impossible. After nearly four years of American occupation, your petitioner, after careful investigation, is aware that less than $125,000 of American capital has been invested in permanent improvements in the islands.

Any future development must come from the United States or Europe, there being no local capital not already employed, and it may be stated as a business proposition that the future development, peace, and prosperity of the islands depends upon the liberality of the laws framed by Congress, and while it is undoubtedly wise to provide restrictions, still, in fairness to those who are willing to go so far from home, and to the inhabitants of the islands, to whom the investment of more money in local enterprises, thus stimulating trade and commerce, means so much, it would hardly seem fair to make these restrictions more rigid and discriminating than in any State or Territory of the United States.

Your petitioner, as previously stated, also represented American capital asking for railway franchises in the islands, but without some concessions by the Government the necessary lines of railroads, so essential to the internal development of the islands, are at the best but a remote possibility, and your petitioner firmly believes that with the rapidly waning interest taken by the people of the United States in these islands unless some relief is afforded by this session of Congress another year will make it impossible to interest the American public in business enterprises in the archipelago.

Your petitioner bases the foregoing upon his personal knowledge of several millions of dollars which was ready for investment there in the spring of 1901, but which has since been diverted elsewhere, and to numerous enterprises of considerable financial magnitude now waiting for and depending upon just and equitable legislation which if not had, as expected, will be prevented from making investments and improvements which would be of the greatest benefit to the Philippines.

Realizing the inestimable value these islands may become to the United States, and, with their wonderful resources developed, the happiness and prosperity which will accrue to their inhabitants, and feeling that this desired end depends so much upon just, wise, and liberal legislation, your petitioner feels justified in asking your honorable body to give these subjects your further consideration.

Respectfully submitted.

H. L. WHEATLEY.

Mr. DUBOIS. I will not take up any more time in reading or commenting upon the bill, but will refer to it hereafter and will address myself now to the commercial aspect of this whole business as it affects the United States.

If it was perfectly manifest that we would be greatly injured commercially by continuing the policy marked out by the majority, if we were absolutely sure that retaining the Philippine Islands would entail great and constantly increasing loss to our own people, we could find some way to let go. If it could be demonstrated that oriental trade was a myth, and the exploiting of the Philippine Islands would injure our own people more and more as we exploited them, then quickly it would become our "manifest destiny" to allow them to have and manage their own country in their own way.

I am so certain that great danger to the white laborer of the United States and world will attend the attempt to awaken the Chinese to industrial activity and competition, and that the development of the Philippine Islands by our capital will work great hardship and inflict serious damage to our own industries and laborers, that I shall have the temerity to attempt to prove it.

In the first place, we can not compete with Japan for the oriental trade.

Japan is about the size of Montana in square miles, and has more than half as many people as the United States.

Up to 1868, when the revolution occurred which overthrew the Shogunate, or the feudal lords, and restored the civil and military power to the Emperor which had been wrested from him by the Shoguns, Japan had been the most isolated country in the world. For the two hundred and fifty years prior to 1868 foreigners were rigidly excluded and the Japanese lived entirely within themselves. Their progress since 1868 has been the wonder of the world.

All kinds of minerals are found there. Gold, silver, copper, lead, mercury, and tin are abundant, and iron is found in many parts of the country.

The lands are highly cultivated, and the Japanese raise sufficient of all agricultural products for their own use and have considerable left for export.

In Tokyo, the capital, nearly every kind of manufacturing is carried on. Osaka reminds one of Pittsburg. Cotton goods, telescopes, microscopes, matches, knives, spoons, watches, woolen goods, and everything you can think of almost is manufactured there.

If you take into consideration that up to 1870 there was no manufacturing to speak of in Japan, you can comprehend how apt these people are.

At first they employed Americans and Europeans to superintend their factories and to teach them how to produce all these different articles. To-day there is not a white man or any foreigners in any of the manufacturing establishments of the country.

Railroads now span the Empire. Electric-light plants are erected in all the cities. Telegraph lines are scattered throughout the whole country.

The first railroad was built in 1872 between Yokohama and Tokyo, a distance of 18 miles. Railroads are now built in all portions of the Empire.

There is not a white laborer employed, from the general superintendent down to the switch tender, including the train dispatchers, and their railroad system is as perfect as that of any country.

Everything necessary for the construction and equipment of a railroad, excepting locomotives, is made in Japan, and it will be but a short time before they will construct their locomotives, as they have the iron, coal, and the ingenuity. Japan now has nearly 2,000 miles of railway in operation and over 1,000 miles of telegraph lines.

In twelve years they have perfected a telegraph system which for organization, dispatch, reliability, and low rate of service is not excelled by any nation of the globe.

Mr. HALE. Is that a governmental telegraph?

Mr. DUBOIS. No, it is under private ownership. Twenty-five years ago not a mile of this system existed, and, as I said, the entire service is performed by Japanese, and, I will say to the Senator, owned entirely by Japanese.

When they first started on their career of development every ton of material had to be imported, mostly from Great Britain. Now, everything necessary to build and equip the best modern telegraph system is manufactured in Japan, and their workshops and factories supply these materials to their neighbors.

There are 8,000 factories in the Empire of various kinds.

As I stated before, minerals abound. Gold and silver are found in paying quantities. There is lead in the north and copper, tin, iron, and quicksilver in the other portions.

Coal is the most profitable mining industry in Japan. Three hundred years ago it was systematically mined in three or four districts, but up to 1876 only the most primitive methods of coal mining were in use. Twenty-five years ago the output was 300 tons per day. Now it is 2,000 tons per day and more, the output being nearly 1,000,000 tons per year, and the supply is apparently inexhaustible. It is equal in quality to the coal of almost any other country.

All of the firearms and ammunition used in the army of Japan are manufactured in the country.

There are 41 cotton-spinning companies, and in a short time, it is confidently stated, the number of spindles in their cotton mills will be quadrupled.

Cotton was introduced into Japan from India, the first cotton seeds being brought there in a boat by accident from India in 799. It did not secure a firm footing until 1570, and was not very extensively cultivated until a century later. The supply has never equaled the demand, and hence Japan imports cotton. The Japanese have no name for cotton in their own language. There are three varieties—yellow, white, and red. They call cotton wata. The average production of cotton per acre is 360 pounds, while the average of the Southern States is one-half bale, or about 250 pounds. A bale of cotton in the Southern States, as I understand, ranges from 400 to 500 pounds.

Mr. CARMACK. Five hundred pounds is the standard bale.

Mr. DUBOIS. Five hundred pounds is the average bale, as I am informed by the Senator from Tennessee.

The number of laborers in the regular cotton mills of Japan in January, 1901, was about 11,000 males and 40,000 females.

Mr. Gouderau, the French consul at Yokohama, in an official report stated that the weaving industry in Japan during 1896 was followed as a trade in 660,408 dwellings or establishments, containing 924,123 looms, and that of the 1,042,866 persons engaged in this industry 57,980 were men and boys and 985,016 were women and girls.

These looms are hand looms of Japanese make, costing about $2.50 each and occupy but little space. They are operated chiefly in dwelling houses, and produce textiles of cotton, silk, and silk cotton mixed. More than one-half of these looms are engaged on cotton goods.

The present number of looms and operatives of the kind mentioned is about the same now as when Mr. Gouderau made his report.

Alfred B. Stephenson, in his article on "Cotton manufacture in Japan," in the volume Cotton Facts, edition of December, 1901, says:

> The extent to which weaving is carried on demonstrates even more forcibly than the mill statistics the importance of the cotton manufacturing industry of Japan. Only about 60,000 bales of cotton are grown in Japan.
>
> I think Japan's exports of cotton manufactures will continue to increase when trade is fully resumed with China. The labor cost of the manufactured product is greater in proportion as the quality of the manufactured product advances, and the cheap labor of the Japanese mills would undoubtedly give them a great advantage over countries in which labor is dear.

CHINESE V. JAPANESE COTTON YARN.

Consul Miller sends from Niuchwang, August 19, 1901, a clipping from the Japan Weekly Times, as follows:

"JAPANESE COTTON YARN'S RIVAL.

"While our yarn is quoted at a considerable price in the Chinese market, owing to its excellent quality, a powerful rival in the form of the Shanghai yarn has begun its career. At present the only Chinese market where Japanese yarn is reigning supreme is that of Hankau, while its rival is steadily gaining ground in various places in North China, in Niuchwang especially. At Chinkiang the Indian yarn has been much in demand, but of late it has, in a manner, been replaced by the Chinese yarn.

"It is said that the Shanghai yarn is not only pretty good in quality, but it sells at a comparatively low price, so that when sufficient improvements are made it may command the cotton-yarn market in China in the not distant future. In short, the Shanghai yarn is now beginning to be the 'rage' all over the Celestial Empire, and the result will be most painfully felt by Japan."

"Inasmuch," says the consul, "as the United States supplies a large amount of raw cotton for Japan and does not export it to China, this change in the markets for Japanese cotton yarn is of considerable interest to our cotton exporters."

According to the Financial Annual of Japan, No. 1, issued by the department of finance for 1900, factory operatives receive from 8 to 15 cents per day; carpenters, 28 cents; tailors, 23 cents; plasterers, 28 cents; stone masons, 33 cents; shoemakers, 25 cents; blacksmiths, 26 cents; compositors, 20 cents; farm hands, 15 cents; male weavers, 20 cents; female weavers, 13 cents; day laborers, 19 cents; servants, per month, $1.65, and maid servants, $1.07 per month. Children receive 3½ cents per day. All operatives work from eleven to twelve hours per day.

Mr. HALE. In what currency is that paid?

Mr. DUBOIS. That is in silver currency.

They have in Japan the raw material out of which to manufacture almost all of their products, and when they have not, with few exceptions, the material is near at hand. For their wool they can go to Australia or to the Mongolian plains of China.

With their vast deposits of coal and iron, both in China and Japan, it will not be long before they will manufacture all the products of iron.

They import their cotton, and a good portion of this comes from the United States. For the seven months ending January, 1902, there were exported from the United States to Japan 64,266,000 pounds of cotton, or 121,578 bales, valued at $6,564,587.

The Japanese get their machinery for their different factories from Europe and the United States, but it will not be long before they will manufacture their own.

With this condition of affairs in Japan how chimerical and utopian it is almost for us to talk about our great trade in the Orient. The Japanese understand the needs and tastes of the oriental people, and with their skilled mechanics and cheap labor they are already supplying not only their own people, but are sending goods into China and other oriental countries. We can not compete with them in these markets.

They are raising some cotton in Japan, and no doubt will go more extensively into this production.

The industrial development of Japan during the past twenty-five years, starting from nothing, ought to be a sufficient object lesson to convince us that extended trade with the Orient is an idle dream.

Now let us turn to China.

China is about one-third larger in area than the United States and has about six times as many people. China has great resources and is well supplied with agricultural and mineral wealth. The alluvial lands produce cotton in large quantities.

Consul Covert, in his report to the State Department under the date of December 6, 1897, as quoted from the Treasury Bureau of Statistics, December, 1899, page 1651, says:

> The Commission sees a great agricultural future in store for Tonkin, Cambodia, and Cochin China. The exceedingly rich soil is capable of producing incalculable quantities of cotton. Of the 5,000,000 acres of cultivable land in Cochin China, only 1,700,000 acres have been cultivated.

Tobacco is grown in many of the provinces, and sugar is grown with considerable success in the southeast.

The coal fields of China are very extensive, and the quality of the coal is good. The deposits of coal in Shansi are said to be the most extensive in the world. They extend over many thousands of square miles and could supply the world all the coal it could use in thousands of years.

Iron deposits are as extensive as coal, and lead, tin, mercury, and copper are found. Gold is mined in Manchuria and is found in some of the southern provinces.

The Chinese are the most industrious workers in the world, and when working can exist on what a white man would starve.

The Chinese have always been very conservative. They have always been opposed to railroad building, and to the opening up of their country to foreigners, and to the development of their own resources. Foreign nations are now vying with each other to arouse the nation to industrial activity. Many railroads are projected.

There was but little commercial intercourse between China and the outside world, and none at all to speak of with the United States, until after the war between China and Japan.

Modern commercial methods began with the treaty between China and Japan in 1895, made at Shimonoseki, at the close of the war between these nations, which was followed by a commercial treaty in 1896. These treaties opened the waters of the principal rivers and canals to the citizens of other nations, allowing all foreigners the right to buy and sell in the interior of China, to engage in manufacturing in treaty ports, and also to bring in all kinds of machinery.

This marked the beginning of the commercial awakening of China. The railroad from Pekin to Teintsin was completed by the Chinese Government. Arrangements were made for the construction of railroads by foreign capital. Telegraph lines were constructed. Electric roads, electric lights, and telephones were introduced in the principal concession towns. Mining and manufacturing concessions were granted. The effect of this was the establishment of factories and business houses, the building of railroads, the multiplication of steam navigation lines, and the opening up of iron and coal mines, which are said to be the largest in the known world.

There has been a rapid development in the manufacturing industries of China in the past few years. There has been an enlargement of factories and an introduction of modern machinery, especially for the manufacture of cotton goods. Already cotton manufacturing is a very important industry. Shanghai has three foreign-owned cotton mills worked by Chinese labor.

The North China Herald publishes a list of the cotton-spinning factories in central China which are chiefly owned by Chinese, which shows that 378,052 spindles were running and 525,252 projected.

I will present a table, without reading it, showing the present status of the cotton-spinning industry of central China, taken from the North China Herald of January 28 last:

Cotton spinning in central China.

All the employees of these factories are Chinese men and boys. Females do not work in the factories of China at all. In this respect they differ from Japan, where girls are employed in large numbers.

I myself went into a cotton mill in Hankau, on the Yangtze River, about 800 miles above Shanghai, and saw 2,500 men and boys employed.

Woolen mills are springing up on all sides, and the wool can easily be secured from Mongolia, where there are immense flocks of sheep.

Some cotton is exported from our Southern States to China. About 10,500 bales were exported in the year 1899–1900; but China itself is a cotton-producing country, and with their surplus labor and millions of acres of fertile alluvial lands it is certain that they will not only produce cotton for their own use, but for Japan and the balance of the Orient as well. If Japan can not supply China with what it needs, China, if aroused to commercial activity, can supply itself.

Consular reports and the reports of others familiar with the labor conditions in China show that the rate of wages of laborers range from 3 to 10 cents per day. Skilled laborers receive from 18 cents to 22 cents per day. The 2,500 men employed in the cotton mill at Hankau, which I visited, received $1.75 per month as their wages and boarded themselves. Consul Gracy, of Fuchau, in his report in 1897 said that cooly labor could be hired for 7 cents per day or $1.50 per month. Good mechanics receive from 10 to 15 cents per day in gold or 20 to 30 cents in silver. The official reports of the State Department for 1895 give the wages of barbers at 3 cents per day; tailors, 10 cents; carpenters, 11 cents; cabinetmakers and blacksmiths, 13 cents; brass workers, 16 cents; cotton factory hands, 18 cents, and cotton mechanics and machinists, 21 cents.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. DUBOIS. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. DUBOIS. I would not do that.

Mr. SPOONER. No; the Senator would not do it, but I do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin suggests the absence of a quorum.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] will insist on his demand for a quorum. The speech the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] is making ought to be listened to by every Senator in the body. It has more real facts of importance in it than almost any speech that has been delivered here.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Allison,	Dubois,	Kittredge,	Pettus,
Bacon,	Elkins,	Lodge,	Quarles,
Bard,	Fairbanks,	McComas,	Quay,
Bate,	Foraker,	McEnery,	Rawlins,
Berry,	Foster, Wash.	McLaurin, S. C.	Simmons,
Beveridge,	Gallinger,	McMillan,	Simon,
Burnham,	Gamble,	Mallory,	Spooner,
Carmack,	Hale,	Martin,	Teller,
Clark, Mont.	Hansbrough,	Mitchell,	Tillman,
Cockrell,	Harris,	Nelson,	Warren.
Culberson,	Heitfeld,	Patterson,
Dillingham,	Kearns,	Perkins,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-six Senators have answered to their names. A quorum of the Senate is present. The Senator from Idaho will proceed.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, I appreciate the fact that the day is sultry; that the debate has been continuous, and that I am making what I hope is an argument—and arguments are always more or less dry. All these things being taken into consideration, I do not wonder that Senators do not care to stay in the Chamber all the time. It is not any personal reflection at all.

Mr. SPOONER. Everybody knows that.

Mr. DUBOIS. I appreciate the kindly word of the Senator from Wisconsin.

I can not share with the enthusiasm of our people who are looking to great trade in the Orient, when as a necessary concomitant of that trade we must stir up China to active industrial competition. They are as skillful as the Japanese, and more industrious than any people on the face of the globe. Under the tutelage of Americans and Europeans they learn to manufacture anything as well as anybody. It seems to me that we are stirring up a great competition with the white laboring classes of the world which must inevitably make the outlook for the laboring man dark and foreboding. There is nothing these Chinese want which we produce, and in a very few years, with their iron, coal, minerals, wool, cotton, and their extensive agricultural lands, they will not only produce everything that they want for themselves, but they will flood the markets of the world with their surplus products. They have the resources, the ability, and the labor, and they are so trained—through centuries of privation and endurance, through centuries of struggle for a bare existence—that no labor can compete with them.

The fact that the exportation of flour from the United States to China and Japan has very largely increased during the past several years has misled many of our people, especially on the Pacific coast, into believing that our trade generally with the Orient would be of great advantage to all sections, and especially to the Pacific coast. This is another idle dream. The Chinese have learned that flour is very nutritious and that it takes the place of a variety of food products, and they will raise all they want for themselves, and more too. Their country is peculiarly adapted to wheat raising, and the only reason they have not raised it before is that they did not know the value of it. They not only can and will raise enough wheat for themselves, but soon they will supply the balance of the Orient with their flour. When once a Chinaman finds out, no matter where he is, whether in the Philippines, the United States, Europe, or China, that any enterprise is a profitable one and he can engage in it he will proceed at once to devote his energies to that enterprise. He has found out that flour is a good thing, and he has the labor and the lands and will proceed to raise wheat. I quote from report of Harry B. Miller, United States consul at Chungking, December 29, 1900:

Wheat is grown to some extent in nearly every section of China. It is grown more extensively throughout the northern and western than in the central and southern portions, and in the north and west it is generally used for food. In these sections the grain is ground in small stone mills operated by hand or animal power and in some places by water power. Throughout the north each family owns its own mill and grinds its own flour. A small stone mill is a part of each farmer's outfit.

The tall millet, growing to a height of 20 feet in some places, does not produce much food per acre, perhaps not more than a fourth as much as wheat; but the stalk is a necessity as a fuel, and it is grown largely for that purpose. The grain is used for animal as well as for human food.

If the Chinese get to using coal, instead of vegetable growths, for fuel, this great area of country, now given up to tall millet, will no doubt be given over to wheat growing; and as this section produces a good quality of wheat, it may be within the possibilities that China will produce the grain to supply most of her flour.

It is a very common misunderstanding of the agricultural and horticultural resources of China to believe that their full possibilities of food production have been reached.

Although agriculture is more highly developed than other industries, its full capabilities in food production are far from being realized. It is conceded that the northern part of China produces the best wheat, and it is claimed that it is as good as the average raised in the United States.

TRANSPORTATION OF GRAIN.

The vast water ways (rivers, creeks, and canals) covering such a large area, reaching in many sections almost every 40 acres of land, with the cheap labor engaged in transportation, make the carrying of grain an insignificant factor in its cost at the mill, and provide every means for its cheap distribution.

PLANTING, HARVESTING, AND THRASHING.

The greater part of the wheat is winter wheat planted in the fall. It is not sown in large tracts as in the United States, but planted in small lots of a fraction of an acre. It is in many cases planted by dropping about three grains in a hole and putting a few ashes in each hill. It is hoed and weeds are pulled out by hand. When ripe, it is cut close to the ground or pulled out by the roots.

The thrashing is done by flails on the ground. The grain is gathered up, with a large percentage of dirt, and sold without being cleaned, so that the dirt adds much to the quantity. Another method of thrashing is to whip the grain over a row of sticks placed on a box.

The wheat is not cleaned before it reaches the mill, and when ground in the native mills much of the dirt is ground into the flour, so that it is gritty. All native mills are of small capacity, made of stone rollers over a stone base, and the product is a coarse, dark, and dirty flour. These mills are generally operated by animals, such as are used in that particular section of China.

There are no good modern plows or agricultural machinery anywhere in China, and animals are little used in proportion to the work done. Hand labor is employed in growing, harvesting, thrashing, and transporting grain to market.

WHEAT PRICES AND WHEAT PESTS.

The usual price paid for wheat delivered at the mills is $2.20 Mexican ($1.10 gold) for 133⅓ pounds.

A large amount of the wheat is found to be injured by weevil, or something like it, that eats out the inner part of the grain and leaves the hull.

FLOUR MILLS IN CHINA.

There have been 3 modern flour mills constructed in China—1 at Tientsin, which was recently destroyed by the Boxers, and 2 at Shanghai. One of the Shanghai mills is furnished with English machinery and has a capacity of 250 barrels per day. This mill is now in operation.

AN AMERICAN FLOUR MILL.

The increasing production of wheat in this part of China and the corresponding rise of a new industry is undoubtedly one of the signs of the advancement of Western ideas among the Chinese people. In the center of the great rice-growing region it is not a little astonishing to find that Chinese enterprise has seized so promptly on wheat as an article of food. The idea of the promoters of the flourishing and beautifully constructed Fou Foong flour mill, beyond the end of the Markham road, is, of course, to supply the foreign communities of northern China with flour which fully equals in quality the imported article.

The Fou Foong is the first modern American flour mill in China, and has been fitted by the Edward P. Allis Company, of Milwaukee, under the personal supervision of that company's representative, Mr. F. G. Morse, of Minneapolis. Its location is on the Shanghai bank of the Soochow Creek. It is a four-story stone and brick building of very pleasing exterior and thoroughly American in appearance and style. The main building is 72 feet long and 40 feet wide. A separate house, 40 by 40 feet, with two large godowns and a handsome, commodious structure alongside for the manager and head miller, completes the building equipment. The appliances for the numerous processes through which the wheat passes until it emerges in snowy flour are of the most modern description.

The mill has 8,000 bushels capacity, and can easily turn out 1,200 sacks of flour of 50 pounds per sack per day.

The power plant consists of a magnificent Corliss engine (Reynolds patent) of 200 horsepower, made by the Edward P. Allis Company, steam being supplied by two large tubular boilers, one large belt condenser, one duplex boiler feed pump. Lighting for night work is furnished by a Sprague electric dynamo.

The entire mill was erected by Mr. Morse with only unskilled cooly labor to help him. The flour turned out is of splendid quality, and we have not seen better or whiter bread than that made from the Fou Foong flour.

This mill turns 75 per cent of the wheat into flour; 84 per cent of this is first-grade patent flour and 11 per cent baker's grade. The grain used is red winter wheat.

The bran is sold for $80 Mexican ($10 in United States currency) per ton, and goes to Japan to be used as a fertilizer.

HENRY B. MILLER,
Consul at Chungking.

SHANGHAI, December 29, 1900.

Also the following from the same writer in regard to Manchuria:

GRAIN FOOD IN MANCHURIA.

Wheat.—This is considered a good wheat country and a quantity is grown and sold, and some little is exported from this port; but the staple food is millet. The natives in grinding wheat produce two grades of flour. One tou (48 pounds) of wheat produces 17 pounds of white, or first-grade flour, and 18 pounds of yellow, or second grade, making 35 pounds in all. Native wheat sells at 2 to 2.25 cents (0.9 to 1.1 cents) a pound, and the flour from 3.5 to 4 cents Mexican (1.7 to 1.9 cents) per pound at retail.

Foreign flour.—This has never been very extensively imported for native use until last year, and then it entered because of troubles in the interior that kept the natives from securing their usual food supply. This year the importation has fallen off to a small quantity. The retail price of foreign flour is the same here as at Shanghai, ranging from $1.70 to $1.90, Mexican (83.3 cents to 86.1 cents), per 50-pound sack. Chinese flour, ground from Chinese wheat in the modern foreign style—roller process—at Shanghai sells here for $1.60 Mexican (78.4 cents) per sack; considerably less than American flour. The native flour brings a higher price than foreign flour, and is for most purposes preferred by the natives, because it is more sticky or tenacious.

I could read many more extracts from reports from our consuls in Asia and from consular reports from all parts of the world which are valuable. It makes no difference what the politics of our consuls in Asia may be, you will find no encouragement in their reports for profitable trade for the United States between the United States and the Orient. The tenor of their reports is sufficient to justify the statement that the Orientals not only can produce and manufacture everything they want, but when stirred into activity will have a surplus to send to the markets of the world, where they will be in competition with the products of white labor.

My fears of Chinese competition are shared by others much more competent to speak than I. I quote the following from a book published in London two years ago, written by Alexis Krausse, entitled "China in Decay:"

What will be the share of China in the world's history, when split up into segments? She, who has held half of Asia as a suzerain power, will have become resolved into a series of dependencies. What is the future in store for the 400,000,000 of people who to-day offer the finest opening for trade with the West that has ever been known?

The question is an absorbing one, and suggests material for study which may startle the student. What will happen when this people, able, energetic, imitative, and industrious, learn to follow the example set by Western nations and take to manufacturing goods and raising produce at a cost which, while it will pay them, will not find a Western laborer in bread? How will it be when China supplies the world with manufactures at a tithe the cost of their production in Western countries? What will become of our Chinese trade when the Celestial supplies his own requirements and undersells his teachers in his own markets? For whatever the fate of China, the people will remain, with their marvelous resources and adaptability, and they only need the education and training we are endeavoring to give them in order to hold their own against the world.

I will also quote the following:

ASIATIC COMPETITION IN THE GREAT MANUFACTURING INDUSTRIES.

Consul-General Jernigan, writing from Shanghai to the State Department, discusses the question of Asiatic competition in the great manufacturing industries of the world as follows:

"The influence of the cheap labor of Asia and its products upon future prices has become a subject of international importance, but the products of this labor in China in its competitive bearing upon the products of American labor is of more interest to us. The American laborer is very properly protected against the competition of the Chinese laborer on American soil, and such protection in no sense discredits the industry of the former; but whether the products of the Chinese laborer will seriously compete in American markets with the products of the American laborer is more the question of the hour.

"In this report I have indicated the belief that competition is not so much to be apprehended in our home markets as it is in the markets of China for our home products, and the plain facts would seem to justify the belief. There has been and is now a valuable demand in the markets of China for the products of British and American looms, but when the desired quality of cotton goods at present imported from Great Britain and the United States can be manufactured in China from the products of her soil, it is unreasonable to expect the importation from foreign countries to continue in such large quantities; and when the products can be produced in necessary quantity on the soil of China and at a far cheaper price, as well as manufactured in China also at a far cheaper price, it is no longer a question that cotton made and manufactured in China will supply the demand of Chinese for cotton goods.

"It will: and it therefore follows that the competition will first begin in the markets of China. The prices—elsewhere given in this report—paid a Chinese laborer are starvation prices to the American laborer, but the price of Chinese food is in proportion to the price of Chinese labor, and the money is received and the food eaten with contentment. Another consideration tending to cause this competition to be more energetic is that the machinery in the cotton mills of China is of the most improved pattern, and that quality as well as the quantity of the cotton goods will enter into the competition. It is certain that there can be produced in China a much superior grade of cotton to that now produced, and with improved machinery Chinese cotton mills will be able to supply the demand for a finer quality of cotton goods, as they are now supplying the demand for the more inferior quality."

Some of our Southern friends seem willing to forget everything else connected with the colonial policy and our trade in the East because of the fact that the Southern States now are selling about $6,000,000 of raw cotton to Japan each year and about $500,000 of cotton to China. It is plain that this demand for raw cotton in these countries will steadily diminish if we teach those people the art of trading. And what is to become of the manufacturers? It is absurd to discuss the feasibility of our sending manufactured cotton goods into that country, and it will be but a short time before our manufactures are confronted in every market of the world with the goods produced by China.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Idaho permit a question?

Mr. DUBOIS. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I should like to ask the Senator whether it is not a fact that as the cotton mills in China have increased, the cotton importations into China from America have also increased instead of diminished?

Mr. DUBOIS. It would not make a particle of difference what sort of an answer I made so far as concerns the contention I am trying to make.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator——

Mr. DUBOIS. No answer I could make would at all disturb the line of argument which I am pursuing.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understood the Senator's argument, and I have been deeply interested in it——

Mr. DUBOIS. My argument is that they will produce it themselves.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; I understood the Senator's argument to be that as cotton machinery in China increased, necessarily they would more and more supply their own demand, and therefore our imports into China, instead of increasing, would diminish. That is the argument of the Senator, is it not?

Mr. DUBOIS. No, sir.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then I have misapprehended the Senator.

Mr. DUBOIS. My argument is that the Chinese and the Japanese could raise sufficient of this stuff not only for their own consumption but to supply other nations.

I am supposing all of the time, of course, in my argument that these gentlemen who talk so flippantly in regard to our great trade in the Orient mean what they say, and intend to teach the people of the Orient to manufacture goods and to produce articles through the exchange of which they can trade with us. They can not trade with us. They have not any money. How are they going to trade with us except through an exchange of goods? Once arouse their activity and demonstrate to them the advantages of trading, the advantages of manufacturing, allow foreigners to develop the country, and China will expand as quickly and to a much larger extent than Japan. You will find after a lapse of twenty-five years the same condition in China as exists in Japan, that not a white man will be employed in any of the different enterprises.

It may be of interest to make a statement in regard to the cotton industries of the world. In closing this portion of my subject I wish to state that in 1901 the number of working cotton spindles in the United States was 20,000,000, of which 14,000,000 were in the Northern States and 6,000,000 in the Southern. Of the 20,000,000 spindles now operating in the United States the New England States have 76 per cent. In 1890 Massachusetts had 41 per cent of all of the spindles of the United States, and the proportion has not been very greatly changed since then.

On August 1, 1900, there were over 1,000,000 cotton spindles in operation in Japan. I can not get accurate statistics, but believe there are not less than 500,000 spindles in operation in China. It does not take a wizard to foretell that the spindles in Japan and China will increase tremendously, and all the time to the detriment of our own spindles, especially those of the New England States. I do not wonder that, dealing with this question purely as a commercial one, the people of Massachusetts are not enthusiastic for oriental trade and development.

The cotton mills of Japan in 1901 used 81,178 bales of Chinese cotton.

If I have raised a doubt in the mind of any Senator that there can be profit to the United States in trade with the Orient, I believe I can satisfy such Senator that there can be no hope of profitable trade relations with the Orient or the Philippines if we hold the Philippines and manage and exploit them as contemplated in the bill now under consideration. A few individuals may reap a profit, but it will be at an enormous expense to the people of the United States, and especially to the laborers and manufacturers and farmers.

In discussing the Philippine question we are met at the threshold with the statement that those who do not want to hold these people as a colony are in favor of "scuttle." The word "scuttle" is used as an offensive epithet. I have taken some pains to look up the derivation of the word; also the meaning. The intransitive verb "scuttle" means to run hurriedly—to hurry. I think the opponents of this bill, the opponents of the imperial policy, are in a hurry to abandon it. "Scuttle," the noun, is a quick pace. I take the first definition. Webster gives the definition of "scuttle," transitive verb, to cut a hole or holes through the bottom or sides of a deck of a ship; to cause a ship to sink by making holes in the bottom.

I imagine that those who apply the word "scuttle" to us as a term of reproach do not mean this definition. We surely do not want to sink the Philippine Islands. On the other hand, we want to remove our deadly pressure so that they may rise. There are many other definitions of "scuttle," as, for instance, the noun "scuttle" sometimes means a small opening or hatchway in the roof of a house or deck of a ship; also a lid closing such a hole.

This, of course, can have no significance as the imperialists apply the word to us. "Scuttle," the noun, is also defined: First, a metal vessel for holding coal—called also a coal scuttle or hod; second, a form of swabber used by bakers in cleaning ovens; third, a flat, shallow basket or dish—platter. This does not apply, of course.

They must mean in the use of the word "scuttle," which they apply so freely, the intransitive verb "scuttle," which means "to hurry." As far as I am concerned, I am content to have that definition apply to me, for I am in a hurry, in the interest of the American people, to get away from the Philippine Islands, believing that no good, but tremendous harm, must come to the American people if we remain there.

Turning to the majority bill again, we find that the public lands are to be sold to corporations and syndicates in tracts of 5,000 acres. It will not be difficult for any syndicate, if they so desire, to control 100,000 or 1,000,000 acres.

I imagine that many Senators have no idea of the vast extent of public lands in the Philippine Islands. It is not disputed that there are about 72,000,000 acres all told, and 5,000,000 acres only are owned by anybody. The balance are public lands. Of these 67,000,000 acres of public lands it is clear to my mind that at least 40,000,000 acres are agricultural lands. The testimony varies as to the proportion of these public lands which are agricultural, but no one has put it less than 50 per cent, or some 35,000,000 acres. I should think that there are nearer 50,000,000 acres than 35,000,000 acres. The soil is exceedingly rich.

Allow me to institute a comparison in order to make clear how much land 40,000,000 acres represent.

The number of acres of farm lands in Massachusetts is 3,147,064; in all the New England States the number is 20,548,999, as follows, by States:

	Acres.
Maine	6,299,946
New Hampshire	3,609,864
Vermont	4,724,440
Massachusetts	3,147,064
Rhode Island	455,603
Connecticut	2,312,085
Total	20,548,999
California	28,828,951
Oregon	10,071,323
Washington	8,499,297
Idaho	3,504,903
Montana	11,844,454
Utah	4,116,951
Wyoming	8,124,536
Colorado	9,474,588
Nevada	2,565,647
Total	86,730,655
Nebraska	29,911,779
Kansas	41,662,970
South Dakota	19,070,616
North Dakota	15,542,640
Total	106,188,005
New York	22,648,109
Pennsylvania	19,371,015
Illinois	32,794,728
Indiana	21,619,625
Iowa	34,574,337
Total	131,007,812

From this comparison you can gain some idea of the immense acreage of these lands which capitalists under this bill are invited to take. The only answer which is made when the iniquities of this bill are pointed out, which allows corporations to acquire these immense tracts of land, is that capitalists will not go there and develop and exploit these lands. I have heard Senators on the other side say that if they thought they would, they would oppose this feature of the bill.

Our American capitalists have taken immense tracts of land in Cuba for sugar-raising purposes since the Spaniards were driven out, and they own all of the available agricultural lands in the Hawaiian Islands, which they use for sugar production. Being familiar with the rich soils of the Philippine Islands, it seems to me that capitalists will take advantage of this opportunity and will rapidly take up and cultivate these lands for the raising of sugar, tobacco, cotton, and the natural and exclusive products of the islands.

If they will not do this, and the Senators are right who say they will not, why not strike this provision out of the bill allowing syndicates and corporations this tremendous privilege. It is plain to me that we are deliberately inviting and encouraging a tremendous production of cane sugar in that country, and encouraging a production of cotton and tobacco.

A part of my argument has been on the assumption that corporations would enter the Philippines, obtain vast tracts of land and exploit the country. They would be induced to do this by the large profits that will accrue to them. I now desire to show that one big corporation has been doing this already, and that it has made large profits by its undertakings, especially in the cultivation of sugar.

I obtain my information from a protest of the Philippine Sugar Estates Development Company, Limited, against the sale of their possessions to the Government, accompanied by reports regarding the value of the land. This protest is found in "Hearings on the Philippines," commencing on page 2353.

The report and protest were made December 9, 1901.

This company owns 8 plantations in the Philippine Islands—3 in Cavite Province, 3 in Laguna, 2 in Bulacan, and 1 in Bataan—purchased from the Dominican friars, paying therefor 3,830,000 pesos, or $1,915,000.

Mr. Richard Andrews afterwards succeeded in organizing a French company with a capitalization of $2,000,000. Mr. Barry Baldwin, the Manila representative of a leading commercial firm of the United States, agreed, on behalf of his firm, to place $100,000 in the shares of this company.

It is now called the "Philippine Sugar Estate Company, Limited," the object of which is to cultivate these 8 plantations, representing about 140,000 acres of land, including land devoted to other purposes besides sugar culture.

They protest againt the sale of these lands to the Government to be parceled out among the tenants, and use as an argument the immense profits accruing and to accrue from the cultivation of these lands.

The report says:

The estates acquired by the company are without doubt the richest and the most valuable property in Luzon.

It further says:

The quality of the land, its cultivation and the products which could be derived from it, the increase in area of productive lands, which would be gained by extending the important system of irrigation established by former owners, the cultivation of land never before cultivated, methods in handling field hands and mechanics, would so increase the present value of the plantations that it is difficult for the company to calculate what price should be put upon them by the least grasping of all who have looked into the matter. It must be remembered that those who have bought stock have done so in the hope of making large profits from the projected development of the plantations as planned in the report referred to.

The lands are devoted principally to the culture of rice and sugar.

To show the wonderful productiveness of these lands, the report states, page 2364, that 2½ acres were measured off and planted in the usual way in cane. It produced 12,775 pounds of raw sugar, valued at $273.75. Deducting all expenses, it left a net profit of $45.50 per acre. The report shows further that in the estates of Calamba, Santa Rosa, Binaan, Naic, and Santa Cruz there are cultivated 37,931 acres, 22,000 acres of which, in round numbers, produce 37,000 tons of sugar annually, valued at $1,586,268, and an additional 12,190 acres, that can be turned to sugar-cane culture with excellent results. This makes in all 50,121 acres in these provinces which would yield an annual profit according to the above estimates of $2,280,505.

The report goes on to say that in only three of the estates situated on the Laguna there are 45,000 acres excellently suited to the culture of sugar cane. "Supposing," it says, "that of this number only 30,000 acres were kept constantly under the culture of sugar cane and the balance of 15,000 acres kept for the supply of alternate plantings to give the land time to rest, the 30,000 acres under constant production would give a result annually of 75,000 tons of raw sugar of a market value of $3,285,000 at the rate of $42.86 per ton. Deducting all expenses of planting, labor, milling, etc., the result leaves a profit of $1,369,000."

The report says:

This result could be easily doubled by a systematic and scientific farming by using European plows, helping the ground with fertilizers, and extracting all the juice from the cane by modern machinery.

There are other corporations owning large tracts of land and all apparently making large profits.

The yield of sugar is so great in tropical countries that we can not compete with them in this country if their acreage is greatly increased. The tropical countries can and will, in my opinion, supply the sugar of the world if white capitalists enter actively into this industry.

The average production of sugar per acre in Louisiana is from 1 to 1½ tons, or from 2,000 to 3,000 pounds. Texas is slightly under Louisiana. The average per acre in Porto Rico is about 4½ tons, or three times that of Louisiana. The average production in Cuba is about 4 tons. The average production in Hawaii is about 4 tons, running as high as 11 tons per acre on one large plantation, which is in a high state of cultivation and where the most modern methods are used for extracting the sugar. Before the war between the Philippines and the United States the normal crop of sugar in the Philippines was about 250,000 tons.

General Taft estimates this year's crop at from 175,000 to 200,000 tons. I think he is wrong about this, as from the best information I can gather the crop was only about 75,000 tons last year. There is no way to find out the average production per acre. The methods used for treating the cane are primitive and the extraction low. With our machinery the output per acre will be at least doubled, and I think it is no flight of the imagination to say that the number of tons per acre which will be raised when white men engage in the occupation will equal that of Hawaii.

The following will show the sugar tonnage exported from the Philippines:

Year.	Pounds.	Long tons.
1861	118,975,780	59,487
1871	195,920,760	97,960
1881	470,760,080	135,375
1890	585,801,440	*292,400
1897		105,000

*More than Hawaii, which produced 243,470 tons in 1899. Hawaii, however, produced 308,450 tons in 1901.

German Consul Paasche, writing in 1888, placed the area in sugar in the Philippines at 58,172 hectares, equal to 143,685 acres.

The sugar industry in the Philippines, with a few exceptions, is in a very low stage of development.

Soil and climate are excellent, but mode of cultivation and method of extraction are primitive and wasteful.

In the island of Negros alone, where the soil is volcanic, like Hawaii, and especially adapted for sugar, only one-fifth of the cultivable area is said to be under tillage. In that island 13,786 hectares, or 33,350 acres, are in sugar. One hundred and seventy thousand two hundred and fifty-seven acres are susceptible to the sugar industry on this island alone. Properly cultivated, with 25 tons of cane to the acre and only 250 pounds of sugar from 1 ton of cane, the crop of Negros alone would amount to 106,400,000 pounds, or 475,000 tons, of sugar.

A writer, speaking of sugar possibilities in the Philippines, says:

With the application of rational methods of cultivation and improved technical processes of production (i. e., extraction) there is good reason to believe that the Philippine Islands may approximate the position held by Java in the international sugar market.

In 1900 Java produced 710,150 tons. Java produces 3.82 tons per acre, as against 1½ tons for Louisiana.

The Taft report of November 30, 1900, page 58, says:

Agriculture is in its infancy here, and the tools and machinery in use are for the most part crude in the extreme. While there are some steam sugar mills in Luzon and Negros, yet the machinery employed is out of date when compared with that in use in Hawaii. In very many instances cane is still crushed between stone and wooden rollers turned by draft animals. If sugar can be advantageously grown and marketed with such machinery and methods as are at present employed, it is certain that profits would be enormously increased were thoroughly modern machinery and methods introduced.

In the Schurman-Dewey-Denby-Worcester Commission report, December 20, 1900, page 246, we find this:

In the Philippines the cultivation of sugar cane is generally carried on with little care and intelligence, and this is one of the reasons why the quantity and quality of the crop has diminished.

In the report of the Philippine Commission to the President, volume 4, 1900, pages 51–52, we find this:

In the manufacture of sugar the best methods are not generally employed. The natives extract the juice by means of mills of stone, wood, or iron, these being called apiches. The juice is then collected and boiled in (open) kettles, a little lime being added to purify it. When the boiling has reached a certain point, which is recognized by an expert, it is passed into another kettle, where the boiling is continued until it reaches a certain temperature. It is then poured into conical molds, which are placed upright so that the molasses may drain off. These molds are placed over small jars, where they remain until the sugar has formed, it being then free from molasses. It will be seen, therefore, that there is great opportunity for improvement in these methods.

From same report, page 12:

From 1889 to 1893 the average sugar exportation from the Philippines amounted to about 11,570,000 pesos per annum; about $6,950,000.

In the same report, page 553, we read, concerning sugar in the island of Negros:

Some of the planters say that there are large tracts of fine sugar land belonging to the government on the southeast and northwest coasts. Negros is considered the best sugar country of the entire archipelago.

The sugar crop is of more value than all of the other products of the island combined. The yield of sugar is from 1½ to 4½ tons per acre, under the most primitive methods. The lesser amount is from some of the older plantations along the coast which have been cultivated for nearly thirty years. On these the yield was said to be double that mentioned at first. Even on the best-equipped plantations little attention is paid to the saving in labor; the laborers have to carry the cane 10 feet and step up 3 feet to get from the truck to the moving table that carries it to the crusher.

The laborers get 6½ cents a day and only two meals of rice and maize, but when making sugar 12½ cents a day and three meals. It has been so easy to grow a profitable crop of sugar on this fertile new land that little careful study has been given the subject by most planters.

Planters spend their money in Manila or Hongkong having a good time, and they borrow money at from 12½ to 25 per cent. This is the old Cuban way also.

Beet sugar averages in the United States from 1 to 1½ tons, and sometimes as high as 1½ tons, per acre. The total beet-sugar yield in the United States for the year 1901–2 was 183,000 tons. The yield of Louisiana in 1901 was about 350,000 tons. The yield of Louisiana was nearly all of the cane sugar raised in the United States. So that the total of the beet-sugar and the cane-sugar crop in the United States was about 550,000 tons.

The production of sugar in Hawaii in 1901 was 350,000 tons. In 1897 the production was only 220,000 tons; so that in the four years since annexation and since American capital has, without incumbrance, exploited Hawaii the output has increased 50 per cent—from 220,000 tons to 350,000. If there was more available agricultural land in the Hawaiian Islands, with American capital and Chinese and Japanese labor, the output would continue to increase. The total production of sugar in Cuba for 1901 was about 800,000 tons. With American capital being invested largely in the sugar lands, we can look for a much greater increase from Cuba.

The total production in Porto Rico for 1899 was 60,000 tons.

The following table gives the sugar output of the United States and her possessions:

	Tons.
Cane sugar in the United States	350,000
Hawaii	350,000
Porto Rico	60,000
Philippine Islands (estimated)	125,000
Total cane sugar	885,000
Beet sugar in United States	183,000
Sum total of all sugar	1,068,000

The total amount of sugar consumed in the United States during the year 1901 was 2,372,316 tons. The United States proper produced in cane and beet sugar one-fourth of the amount consumed in the United States. It would not be difficult for us in a reasonable time to produce all the sugar we use in the United States, which would be an advantage to our own capitalists, farmers, and consumers.

We are starting in a path that will prevent this and be detrimental to every class of people in our country except the few capitalists who desire to go into the tropical countries and cultivate sugar with Japanese and Chinese labor to put in competition with the product of our country.

Beet sugar constitutes 60 per cent of the world's sugar crop. In 1901 the world's production of beet sugar was 5,510,000 tons and of cane sugar 2,908,000 tons. With the exploitation of cane sugar in the tropical countries by American capitalists our own cane-sugar and beet-sugar interests must inevitably be sadly crippled, if not destroyed.

There is another thing which may be interesting one of these days to our Southern planters and also to our manufacturers who see in the Philippines an imaginary place for "trade." In the report of the Philippine Commission to the President (1900), volume 4, page 11, we find these observations on cotton:

Some time ago cotton obtained some importance in the Philippines because it was the principal material of the domestic weaving industry, now reduced to very limited proportions on account of the competition of English and Spanish cotton cloths, which are imported to the amount of $2,500,000, and because of the tax on looms.

Spain did not want to encourage cotton weaving in the Philippines.

COTTON CULTURE IN THE PHILIPPINES.

From Report of the Philippine Commission, dated November 30, 1900, page 60:

These islands produced cotton in some quantity before the days of the Spanish Government tobacco monopoly, when the cultivation of cotton necessarily fell into neglect. It is now raised in a very small way in some of the northern provinces of Luzon, but tobacco is still the important crop of this region, and the people are slow to abandon an industry which is yielding them steady returns and embark in a new one with which they are not familiar, so that it is hardly likely that there will be much increase in the local cotton crop in the near future. It can be profitably woven into fabrics here, however, on account of the abundance of suitable and cheap labor, and the Commission is informed that there are several projects on foot for the establishment of extensive cotton mills in the islands, those interested intending to import raw American cotton.

Geographically, the Philippines lie about in the same degrees of latitude as the country south of the City of Mexico—south of the Isthmus of Panama. The northerly point in the Philippines is some 5 degrees of latitude south of the southerly point of Texas.

In Circular No. 17 of the Agricultural Department, dated May 15, 1899, the following is found on this subject:

Cotton occupies a peculiar position in the Philippines. It was the first raw fiber used locally in the manufacture of textile fabrics, but it has recently lost much of its former importance, partly because of the excessive taxation that has for some time been imposed on the textile industry of the islands, but principally because of the competition of British fabrics.

The cotton plants cultivated in the Philippines are chiefly of the herbaceous varieties. They yield a fine white staple of superior quality and strength. One variety, however, known under the name of cayote, produces a cinnamon-colored fiber. There is also a species called bubuy that grows like a shrub. The fiber it produces can not be employed in weaving, but is used for stuffing mattresses, pillows, cushions, etc.

Another textile plant that occurs is the amiray. This plant is found only on the Batanes Islands north of Luzon. It closely resembles ramie and yields a fine, white fiber of great tensile strength.

Various other fiber plants are found in the Philippines, such as the pita (a kind of aloe), the balibago, the dalanct, or nettle-tree, the pineapple, and the cabonegro (a species of palm tree), as well as many other varieties more or less unknown outside of the archipelago.

Professor Worcester (The Philippine Islands, page 505) writes:

A species of tree cotton grows wild on many of the islands. The fiber is too short to be of value for weaving, but it is used for stuffing pillows and the like. Before ripening its pod the tree sheds all its leaves.

Long-staple cotton was at one time successfully raised in Ilocos Norte, but its cultivation was discouraged by the authorities, who preferred to have the natives grow tobacco.

Senate Document No. 171, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, says of "Coffee and cotton in the Philippines:"

Coffee and cotton were formerly produced in large quantities, the former for export and the latter for home consumption; but the coffee plant has been almost exterminated by insects, and the home-made cotton cloths have been driven out by the competition of those imported from England.

Witnesses before the Commission (vol. 2, first Philippine Commission Report, pp. 274 and 426) testified that cotton could be raised to good advantage, and named Ilocos Sur and Ilocos Norte and Norte Island as localities especially adapted to its growth.

As confirming the foregoing it will be found upon examination of reports from the islands that the value of cotton exported is but nominal, whereas the importation of cotton in its varied conditions have been as follows (see Philippine summaries):

Value of cotton goods imported in—
1893	$5,866,819
1894	5,877,138
1899	4,600,488
1900	8,783,076
1901	7,110,319

We have not the slightest doubt—

Says Dr. Sam Martin, who has written a valuable little book on the cultivation of cotton in the Philippines—that with a good choice of land, with the adoption of seed best adapted to the quantity and quality harvested, and with the use of American cotton-working machines, either worked by hand or motor, and without omitting anything essential, the greatest success would crown the work undertaken by cotton raisers.

And this, it says, would lead to factories in Manila.

There is not a question in my mind that China and the Philippines, when the one is aroused and the other exploited, will be as serious competitors to our cotton raisers of the South and manufacturers of cotton goods in the New England States as to our cane producers of the South and beet-sugar raisers of the West.

Manufacturing establishments will be erected in the Philippines under the encouragement of this majority bill. Factories will spring up as they have in Japan and as they are being created in China. These factories will get their raw material which is not produced in the islands from other countries. Woolen mills can secure their wool from China and Australia, and the cotton mills their cotton from the United States until it is produced in the Philippines and China, which, in my judgment, will not be long, and their other raw materials from the same sources from which the Japanese draw their supplies. It is not reasonable to doubt that they will manufacture not only for the trade of the islands, but also for China and the Straits Settlements.

It alarms me, even if it makes no impression on my Republican friends, to contemplate that they will produce woolen goods, cotton goods, and other articles which they will sell in our own markets, because their labor will be so cheap that we can not compete with them even when they pay the cost of transportation. It is not a good argument to answer that when we find they are manufacturing goods and putting them in competition with our own manufactures and underselling us that we can exclude them by our tariff laws.

I am aware of the fact that Congress and the Supreme Court has decided that we can levy a tax on goods coming from Porto Rico and the Philippines. It will not avail us, however, if we put the tariff so high as to exclude the manufactures and other articles produced in the Philippine Islands from the United States. We can not control the tariff laws of the other nations of the world, and these goods, manufactured by this cheap labor under experienced superintendents and foremen from America, will meet and compete with our goods in all of the markets of the world.

It does seem to me we can not escape the conclusion if there is industrial activity and manufacturing carried on in the Philippines by the capital of corporations and syndicates in this country that our own people must suffer. If there is to be no industrial activity, and our capitalists will not go there, then your entire contention is a myth, and we had better stop the tremendous expense which is weighing down on us for nothing and let the natives establish a government of their own. These lands will be cultivated by corporations and syndicates, and these factories will be established by corporations and syndicates, else there will be no cultivation of the lands or establishment of factories.

The majority evidently expect capitalists to form corporations and syndicates for the exploitation of these islands, for they mention them specifically in the bill and offer them the greatest inducements to go there. As I have said before, and I repeat it again, if these islands are exploited by corporations and syndicates it will be to the tremendous disadvantage of the people of the United States. If they are not to be exploited, why not strike these provisions out of the bill?

It must be perfectly plain to anyone who has kept pace with current history that the labor in the fields and in the factories of the Philippines must be performed by Chinese coolies. There is no other labor fit to do this work.

In Hawaii, which is less tropical, Japanese and Chinese coolies perform all of the labor on the sugar plantations, and there is an incessant demand from Hawaii that we amend our immigration laws so that contract Chinese and Japanese labor can be procured for their sugar plantations. The Hawaiian planters say that without Chinese or Japanese labor they can not exist. The same argument applies to the Philippines. The Filipinos themselves do not object to the Chinese as laborers. Nowhere does it appear that they have an antipathy to the Chinese on account of competition with them as laborers.

The Filipinos, like all other tropical people, are averse to manual labor and will not and can not perform it. The Filipinos object to the Chinese because up to the present time the most of them have become small shopkeepers, and the Filipinos can not compete with them as shopkeepers, a favorite occupation of the ambitious Filipino. White men can not and will not labor in the Philippines or in any other tropical country. They never have done it and they never will. All the testimony, without exception, proves that white men can not and will not perform manual labor in the Philippines. There is nothing left, then, but Chinese cooly labor. In this connection I desire to present some testimony which has come to Congress and the Philippine Committee of the Senate.

The American Chamber of Commerce of Manila. An appeal to Congress for the enactment of laws allowing cooly labor to enter the Philippine Islands under such restrictions and laws as the Philippine Commission may from time to time enact.

To the Congress of the United States of America:

The American Chamber of Commerce of Manila, P. I., respectfully represents to your honorable body:

That by authority and under instruction of resolution adopted at a full meeting of this chamber held on the 3d day of January, 1902, this chamber does petition and earnestly request the enactment of laws by Congress allowing cooly labor to enter the Philippine Islands, under such restrictions and laws as the Philippine Commission may from time to time enact.

The present restrictive law does not benefit the Filipinos, nor is it of benefit to anyone. This labor will not enter into competition with American labor, and its entry into the Philippine Islands is imperatively needed.

Tobacco, hemp, and sugar plantations are only partially cultivated by reason of insufficiency of manual laborers. There are at present people in the city of Manila who came here for the purpose of investing in plantations and to cultivate them upon lines far in advance of the primitive ideas now in vogue. Investors are compelled to either leave these islands or await such time as laborers can be secured. This being the situation at present, without this legislation the Philippine Islands can not be properly developed.

Building in the city of Manila has been retarded for months, and only since the quarantine has been raised and those Chinese entitled to land have returned to these islands has building actively revived.

For the development of these islands the urgent necessity for the immediate enactment of such laws can not be placed too strongly before Congress. For which relief this chamber, composed of American citizens representing the commercial interests of the Philippines, does most respectfully pray.

F. E. GREEN, President.
ROGER AP C. JONES, Secretary.

The American Chamber of Commerce of Manila. A memorial to Congress suggesting needed legislation for the Philippine Islands.

To the Congress of the United States of America:

The American Chamber of Commerce respectfully represents to your honorable body.

* * * * * * *

For the immediate passage of laws for the admission of cooly labor, as the native labor is inadequate and insufficient for the development of the resources of the islands.

* * * * * * *

Adopted at a full meeting of the American Chamber of Commerce held on the 6th day of February, 1902.

F. E. GREEN, President.
ROGER AP C. JONES, Secretary.

I desire at this point to quote from the testimony of Governor Taft before the Philippine Committee, to be found on pages 96 and 97 of the hearings:

CHINESE AND FILIPINO LABOR.

Senator HALE. Do you think it is a possibility or a probability that in expending this large amount of money on public works you will be driven to the necessity of bringing in Chinese?

Governor TAFT. That is what the contractors say.

Senator HALE. You think it may come to that?

Governor TAFT. I hope not. Some of the quartermasters in the Army, Captain Butt, particularly, think it is possible by care to secure labor and teach it constancy. But if you talk with the business man in Manila, who is usually not very friendly toward the Filipino, he scouts the idea; and I think possibly you have already had a petition from the American Chamber of Commerce of Manila to allow the entrance of Chinese, because the labor of the Filipinos is so unsatisfactory.

CHINESE LABOR.

Senator CARMACK. Is there not considerable prejudice among the Filipinos against the introduction of Chinese?

Governor TAFT. Yes, sir. It is a political question as well as an industrial question. It is one upon which the Commission has made no recommendation, because it is such a delicate question.

The Chinaman comes into the country and labors, say, at 12 silver dollars a month and 15 silver dollars a month. Out of that, the local saying is, he saves $16 or $18. At any rate, he is not there for more than three or four months before he has capital enough out of what he has earned to set up a store, and when he sets up a store the Filipino who has a store next to him is driven out of business. It is not so much his competition as a laborer that attracts the hostility of the Filipino as it is his competition as a merchant.

I also quote from the testimony of General Hughes, to be found on pages 643 to 648 of the hearings:

LABOR CONDITIONS IN THE ISLANDS.

Senator DUBOIS. Yes, sir. Yesterday I presented to the Senate and had read an appeal from the American Chamber of Commerce of Manila. I think almost every Senator received the same appeal.

The CHAIRMAN. It was presented to the Committee on Immigration, too.

Senator DUBOIS. I will not read it all unless you desire me to, but it says:

"Tobacco, hemp, and sugar plantations are only partially cultivated by reason of insufficiency of manual laborers. There are at present people in the city of Manila who came here for the purpose of investing in plantations and to cultivate them upon lines in advance of the primitive ideas now in vogue. Investors are compelled to either leave these islands or await such time as laborers can be secured. This being the situation at present, without this legislation the Philippine Islands can not be properly developed."

The legislation they ask for is the repeal of the laws of Congress in regard to Chinese immigration, so that cooly labor shall be allowed to enter the Philippine Islands. Can white labor develop the agricultural lands in the Philippine Islands?

WHITE LABOR A TOTAL FAILURE IN THE ISLANDS.

General HUGHES. My own opinion is that white labor will be a total failure. I mean the actual labor.

Senator DUBOIS. In cultivating the fields?

General HUGHES. Yes, sir.

Senator DUBOIS. And doing the manual labor?

General HUGHES. The white man who expects to work his own land will die in a very short time.

* * * * * * *

LABOR IN CULTIVATION OF LANDS.

Senator DUBOIS. What labor can cultivate those lands? Take timber, for instance. When they fell the trees and do the manual labor in cutting the timber, what labor is necessary to do it?

General HUGHES. The native is not good at anything that is heavy. He is a weak man when it comes to lifting or anything of that kind. I can illustrate it. I had to rebuild the bridge at Iloilo, and I could not stop traffic, because the troops had to be supplied by way of that bridge. I detailed one of my aids in charge of it, gave him all the natives that could work conveniently, with his means, and he finally came to me and said he could not do it. The only way I got it done, without stopping the traffic and delaying everything, was to make a promise to a dozen American prisoners who were held there that if they would build that bridge—that is, drive the piles for it, which was the hard work, which it was estimated would take thirty days—they should be pardoned and sent home. They took it and carried out their contract to the hour.

CHARACTERISTICS OF FILIPINOS.

Senator DUBOIS. Are they not like all Latin races, or all people who come under the domination of the Spaniards, indolent; and if they do not go to a bullfight, will they not go to a cockfight? Will they not go off for two or three days if they get two or three dollars? Can you depend upon them as laborers, even if they had the physical ability?

General HUGHES. They are lazy. They want at least three days in a week, if you give it to them, and they want to go to cockfights, and they want to gamble, and they want to whet up their bolos.

* * * * * * *

LABOR IN THE ISLANDS.

Senator DUBOIS. Our bill provides for franchises. We invite capital over there. You are a pretty robust American yourself. Americans will go there with capital. They will want some labor. They are not going to sit around and theorize and wait for the development of the Filipino mind. They want action for their money. Where are they going to get their labor? What labor is there for them?

General HUGHES. I should not be surprised if they could get the negro from America. I have looked into this matter. They can get labor from Japan without any trouble at all.

Senator DUBOIS. They can get the Japanese. There is no restriction against them.

General HUGHES. They can get millions, of course, from China.

Senator DUBOIS. You can not get the negro, if you will pardon me. We can not deport the negro. He will not go. There is nothing left except Japanese and Chinese labor, is there?

General HUGHES. That is about the way I figured it up. The Chinaman is a very much superior man to the Filipino.

The CHAIRMAN. For labor, you mean?

General HUGHES. For labor. We used them altogether in our carpenter work and anything of that kind which had to be done in our building operations.

The CHAIRMAN. That is, skilled labor?

General HUGHES. Skilled labor. The native is a very poor carpenter or general workman. He is quite apt in machinery. He has deft fingers and can manipulate things excellently. As a machinist he is quite apt to be a success, and we use him on quite a number of our boats, and if he was not too lazy to keep it in order——

* * * * * * *

WHITE LABOR OUT OF THE QUESTION.

Senator DUBOIS. You have stated that white labor is out of the question?

General HUGHES. It is, in my opinion. I think the man would die as soon——

Senator DUBOIS. There is nothing left, of course, except some dark labor?

General HUGHES. Yes.

* * * * * * *

WHAT LABOR WILL THE ISLANDS GET?

Senator DUBOIS. Let me ask you a question which you can answer directly. What labor do you think they will get there, white labor being excluded?

General HUGHES. And you also want the Japanese left out?

Senator DUBOIS. No. What labor will they get?

Senator PATTERSON. Outside of white labor?

Senator DUBOIS. White labor being excluded.

General HUGHES. I hope Japanese. They have a good deal of Chinese labor there now.

Senator DUBOIS. What do you believe?

General HUGHES. I have no doubt that will increase.

The CHAIRMAN. It is now restricted. The Chinese are shut out.

General HUGHES. But you can not keep them out.

Senator DUBOIS. I am coming to that, if you will allow the General to answer my question, if he will. White labor being excluded, what labor is going there?

General HUGHES. I think it is mainly Chinese.

I now turn to the testimony of General MacArthur, who differs a little from the other witnesses. He deprecated the exploitation of the islands by Americans. He was very much opposed to corporations getting large tracts of land. If I interpreted him correctly from his testimony, he desired that the Filipinos themselves should develop their own country slowly and gradually. I quote from him, pages 1379, 1380, and 1383:

Senator DUBOIS. These lands under this bill which we are now considering are to be leased or sold in tracts of not less than 5,000 acres. That is the bill that we are considering.

The CHAIRMAN. Not exceeding 5,000 acres?
Senator DUBOIS. Not exceeding 5,000 acres.
General MACARTHUR. You mean the undeveloped public lands?
Senator DUBOIS. The undeveloped public lands; yes. Now, it is a reasonable supposition that if Americans go over there to cultivate those lands, to put them into sugar, in organizing companies they will take 5,000-acre tracts. Suppose they should take them in large tracts, can the Filipinos do the farm labor and cultivate those lands?
General MACARTHUR. I think so. They can do it to the extent of necessity so far as the public interest requires, most decidedly.
Senator DUBOIS. Can they do it to the satisfaction of the Americans who go over there?
General MACARTHUR. Not to the satisfaction of the American or European exploiters, no; but they can do it to the limit of necessity and the beneficial interests of the nation, both American and Philippine.
Senator DUBOIS. I can not quite understand that answer, General. You of course are very familiar with Americans and their methods. You know, as all of us do, that the Americans have now advanced in industrial life to such an extent that nobody can compete with them.
Senator DIETRICH. Could I ask the General a question right there——
Senator DUBOIS. I do not care to be interrupted right in the middle of a question.
Senator DIETRICH. It is along that line.
The CHAIRMAN. It had better wait until Senator Dubois finishes his question.
Senator DUBOIS. And knowing the enterprise of our capitalists, if they go over there and put their money in, they will want returns for it, and they will want labor which is satisfactory to them. Will the Filipinos, in your opinion, perform this labor to their satisfaction?
General MACARTHUR. They will perform the labor. Whether it will be to the satisfaction of those people you describe I do not know. From my own point of view I deprecate the idea advanced in your question, that we are going to sell public lands there in blocks of 5,000 acres, with a view to rapid exploitation. That I should regard as disastrous both to American and Filipino interests, absolutely.
Senator DUBOIS. That is in the bill which we are considering, which is going to pass.
General MACARTHUR. Well, I should answer your question with a modification stating that the Filipinos would furnish the labor.
Senator DUBOIS. Would not?
General MACARTHUR. Would. They would have to be paid to do it, though, on the basis of American labor.
Senator DUBOIS. What would the Filipino farm hands charge for their labor?
General MACARTHUR. They would charge what they could get, and if that kind of work was undertaken they would charge a great deal; they would charge about what they do in Montana, probably.
Senator DUBOIS. They would charge what farm hands would in Montana?
General MACARTHUR. Yes.
Senator DUBOIS. Do you think these American capitalists would employ them?
General MACARTHUR. I do not think they would.
Senator DUBOIS. You know the Filipinos and their capacity for work. Do you think they would employ those Filipino hands?
General MACARTHUR. I do not think they would.
Senator DUBOIS. Then, they would not open up the land?
General MACARTHUR. Then that would be a good fortune to everybody concerned.

* * * * * * *

Senator PATTERSON. Then, under the most favorable auspices at the present time, a Filipino is willing to work for one-third of what the American is willing to work for?
General MACARTHUR. I should say so offhand; yes.

I quote from the testimony of General Otis, to be found on pages 837–841 of the hearings:

HOW ISLANDS TO BE DEVELOPED.

Senator DUBOIS. Let me ask you this question: If we have any object in view at all it is to develop those islands. If we develop those islands, will we not have to do it with some labor outside of the Filipinos?
General OTIS. Yes; if we develop them rapidly. If the development is slow, the Filipino might furnish sufficient labor.
Senator DUBOIS. Then if we do not get some labor outside of the Filipino labor the islands will not be developed, will they?
Senator BEVERIDGE. He does not say that.
General OTIS. No rapid development; probably no satisfactory development.
Senator DUBOIS. I am perfectly sincere, as these gentlemen know. I am very much interested in this branch of the question and its connection with the civil bill which we have under discussion. Now, that being so, these men, I assume, if they go over there with their capital, will want to get some returns for their investments. Now, white labor being excluded and Filipino labor not being adequate and satisfactory, what labor do you think would most naturally be demanded?
General OTIS. They wish cooly labor undoubtedly.

JAPANESE SATISFACTORY LABORERS.

Senator DUBOIS. The Japanese, of course, could come in. There is no exclusion law against them?
General OTIS. No.
Senator DUBOIS. Would the Japanese be as satisfactory as the Chinese cooly labor?
General OTIS. They would be very satisfactory, I think.
Senator DUBOIS. The Japanese would be as satisfactory as the Chinese cooly?
General OTIS. They affiliate with the Filipino.
Senator DUBOIS. And stand the climate well?
General OTIS. Yes; they stand the climate well.

PETITION FOR REPEAL OF EXCLUSION LAW.

Senator DUBOIS. Now, this is the second petition that has come from the American Chamber of Commerce insisting that Congress shall remove the restrictions in regard to Chinese cooly labor, and in addition to that, in the Hawaiian Island they are pressing us constantly to allow Chinese and Japanese labor to come in; they say that otherwise they can not cultivate their sugar fields. Do you not think that when this American Chamber of Commerce is augmented by these capitalists, whom we induce to go over there to put in their capital, that the demand will be incessant on us to allow Chinese cooly labor to come in?
General OTIS. I think you will receive constant demands from these companies. You see, it is for their pecuniary benefit, and I have no doubt you will get demands constantly.
Senator DUBOIS. I can not see what we are going to do——
General OTIS. I should say Chinese labor under restrictions, limiting the number.
Senator DUBOIS. It must be Chinese labor or Japanese labor?
General OTIS. Yes; there is no other foreign labor there, I think, that could remain for any length of time under the conditions of climate.

INDUSTRIAL CONDITIONS IN CHINA AND JAPAN.

Senator DUBOIS. That would be the same if, for instance, great manufacturing establishments like they have in Japan—have you been to Osaki?
General OTIS. No.
Senator DUBOIS. Well, they have great manufacturing establishments in China and Japan.
General OTIS. Yes; I am aware of that.
Senator DUBOIS. If our capitalists would erect a great manufacturing establishment, woolen mills and cotton mills, like they have in Japan, employing 2,500 or 3,000 hands, would not the same difficulties of labor present themselves?

CHINESE POPULATION OF ISLANDS.

General OTIS. That is not that class of labor, to a certain extent. I estimate the Chinese population at about 85,000, and a large part of it is concentrated in Manila. And we never have had any difficulty in getting all the Chinese labor we wanted.
Senator DUBOIS. Some estimate it as high as 150,000.
General OTIS. I do not think there are that number of them.
Senator DUBOIS. Say 85,000.
General OTIS. That would be a very large supply to draw from, and of course it would run a great many factories, and possibly it would be some time before we would have to let the cooly labor in.
Senator DUBOIS. But that would be the labor they would get, would it not—either that or the Japanese?

FILIPINO LABOR.

General OTIS. And also Filipino labor. Now, some of those large establishments are carried on entirely by Filipino labor to-day. Take the cigar manufacturers, for instance.
Senator DUBOIS. How many hands do they employ?

TOBACCO INDUSTRY.

General OTIS. Oh, I suppose there are 10,000 people employed in the tobacco industry in Manila at the present time. The Filipinos came to me after I had been there for a short time, and they wished to know if they could establish a tobacco manufactory. I had quite a long conversation with them, and I replied that they could, but to keep all the stock in the hands of the Filipinos; not to let the Europeans or anybody else outside have any of the stock. They went to work and built up quite a large establishment, and I suppose that stock to-day is worth 200 or 300. They employ 300 or 400 men.
Senator DUBOIS. That work is not nearly so heavy, however, as the work in woolen mills and cotton factories, and is not so constant?
General OTIS. I think there is a great deal of Chinese labor in the islands at the present time; a good deal of Filipino labor. All the work on the railroads is done by Filipinos. All the officials are Filipinos except a few of the most important officers.

* * * * * * * *

Senator DUBOIS. Now, General, you have stated that white labor is out of the question, and that the Filipino labor is inadequate and insufficient, and that there must be some other labor, either Chinese or coolies or Japanese.
General OTIS. Asiatic labor; yes.

In addition to the accepted facts known to us, that labor can not and will not be performed by white men in the Philippine Islands, is the testimony of the representative men of the Army and the Administration, that the labor must be performed by Chinese coolies. General MacArthur thinks if the lands are opened in small tracts that the Filipinos could do the labor. He would not admit that it was in contemplation to sell the lands in 5,000-acre tracts. General MacArthur did say that a Filipino would work for one-third what a white man would demand.

There are some things so patent, so inevitable, that men of common intelligence can not fail to comprehend them. There is not a Senator on this floor who does not know that when our capitalists go to the Philippines and start up these great industries, of the factories and of the field, their demands for labor will be so incessant that they will be heard. There was a strong sentiment, and there is a growing sentiment among the leaders of the Republican party against rigid laws for Chinese exclusion, even in the United States.

Those most familiar with the menace to our labor in this country by Chinese competition, those most familiar with the habits of the Chinese—I mean the Representatives in the other branch and the Senators from the Pacific coast States—were unable at this session to pass such a Chinese-exclusion law as was demanded and as is necessary. So far as this body is concerned, the Chinese-exclusion act passed at this session was to extend only for a few years.

Until the Chinese cooly is allowed to go into the Philippines the Japanese cooly will go there and perform the labor. There is no law to exclude them. The Chinese cooly is preferable, and with such extended coast they will be smuggled in in as large numbers as are wanted. At the present time there are, so far as I can ascertain, about 150,000 Chinamen in the islands, who can do an immense amount of work, and will do it if they have constant employment and certain wages, which they will receive from the capitalists who start enterprises there.

Mr. MCCOMAS. If the Senator will permit me, has he been able to estimate the number of Japanese coolies now in the Philippines?

Mr. DUBOIS. I did not try to ascertain the number.

Mr. CARMACK. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I will call his attention to the fact that General Hughes, in his testimony, said that if we did pass laws to exclude Chinese from the islands it would be impossible to keep them out of the Philippine Islands; that we could not keep them out.

Mr. DUBOIS. I suggested that in view of the great extent of the coast we can not keep them out, judging from the difficulty we have had in keeping them out of this country.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator understand that the Chinese are increasing in numbers there now?

Mr. DUBOIS. In the Philippine Islands?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes. That question is brought out by reason of the remark made by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. CARMACK. Does the Senator from Indiana ask me the question?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will ask the Senator.

Mr. DUBOIS. I do not know whether or not they are increasing now.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I presume I am correct in the recollection that the Chinese legistion of the present session of Congress absolutely prohibits Chinese going into the Philippines?

Mr. DUBOIS. I never questioned that at all.

Mr. GALLINGER. So if they get in, they get in just as they do in the United States, by fraud or in some other objectionable way.

Mr. TELLER. They will get in.

Mr. CARMACK. If the Senator will allow me I will suggest the difference. One is ,that they can more easily get into the Philippine Islands, with its extent of coast line, and in addition to that there is the almost general sentiment among Americans in the Philippine Islands in favor of letting them in. It would be practically impossible to keep them out, with no effective public sentiment to enforce the law.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Will the Senator from Idaho permit me to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question? I have refrained from interrupting the Senator from Idaho, because I have perceived that he was making a connected argument, although several times I wanted to ask a question. But the Senator from Tennessee has made a statement which calls for a question which is pertinent.

Mr. DUBOIS. I yield.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator from Tennessee understand that the Chinese population of the Philippines is increasing or has increased since General Otis's order excluding them?

Mr. CARMACK. I have not taken any census of the Chinese population over there and I do not know anything about it.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; but you have made a statement to the effect that the necessary operation of the geographical location and other conditions there would be that Chinese-exclusion laws would not be effective. Therefore it is pertinent to ask the Senator whether he has any facts to show that there has been an increase in the Chinese population. As a matter of fact there has not been.

Mr. CARMACK. I am simply drawing an inference. I do not suppose the Senator from Indiana knows.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will be glad to submit to the Senate what I know.

Mr. CARMACK. I am drawing a logical inference as to what would be the natural result.

Mr. DUBOIS. I have been attempting to prove that if the majority bill passes and capitalists go there the islands can not escape Chinese labor. If I have not proved it, of course Senators will not accept my conclusions. I should not think the Chinese would go there much now, and I have not said they would until the majority bill passes and becomes operative.

As I have said before, and I repeat it again, if there is anything needed by the Chinese which they themselves or the Japanese do not supply, it will be supplied by the Philippines, and raised or produced by as cheap labor almost as they have in China and Japan. The outlook, if this bill passes, is not promising for anyone except the capitalists, except the corporations and syndicates. The only trade the United States now has, or will have in any event, with the Philippine Archipelago is with our own people and with the foreigners who go there.

There is nothing that we have which the Filipinos will care for. This trade will increase about in the same proportion as the foreigners will increase in the islands, and the number of foreigners will be small. This has been the case in all tropical countries in the past, and will, of necessity, be the case in the future. The only Americans and foreigners who will go there will be officeholders and those who are investing capital. These will constitute a small class. They will, however, practically be our only consumers. The total trade of the United States with the Philippine Islands is about $5,000,000 per year.

I can not see how this trade can be very greatly increased. We have spent more money in the prosecution of the war in the Philippine Islands than the profit of all the trade with those islands will amount to in the next one hundred and fifty years. If this war should stop now it would take us over two hundred years to get even through profit on our trade with these islands. Every day we remain in the islands the greater our loss will be. I will, with the consent of the Senate, present, without reading, for the information of the Senate and the country, a detailed statement of the commerce of the Philippine Islands with every nation in the world with which they trade:

Mr. HALE. Right here, touching the question of oriental trade, has the Senator in his investigations seen the figures showing the proportion of Great Britain's trade with her great colony, India, with about 250,000,000 people?

Mr. DUBOIS. I will say to the Senator that I have looked up those statistics, but did not see any place to use them.

Mr. HALE. England's trade with her great Indian colony of 250,000,000 people, the oriental trade of Great Britain, is only about 7 per cent of her trade. Compared with her other trade it is as nothing.

Mr. DUBOIS. I should think that would be the case wherever white people dominated orientals or dark people. White people will not go there to live. About the only trade that the mother country can have with the colonies is with the white people who are there. As a general rule I think that will hold good.

Some Senators on the other side state that they have never said, nor will they say, that they intend holding the Philippine Islands permanently. Some, like the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. PRITCHARD], state in plain terms and with emphasis that we will never give them up. The great majority on that side, however, and those who are in sufficient numbers and have sufficient influence to determine the policies, announce that there is no necessity to say what they will do in the future. The policy is, as announced by these leaders, who constitute the majority of the Republicans, to meet every question as it arises, to do the best they can for the present, and to solve future difficulties and questions as they may arise in the future.

I have tried, in what I have said, to be temperate in language. I have endeavored to argue the question presented by this majority bill fairly, with good temper, and honestly. I do not think it will be easy to get out of the Philippine Islands, should future events demonstrate the wisdom and necessity of doing so, after American capital has gone there and is being employed under the tempting opportunities presented by this bill.

Do they not know, if this bill passes, the difficulties in our path will be multiplied many times, provided in the future it is deemed patriotic and wise to allow the Filipinos their own independent government? The granting of these extra privileges and unusual inducements which are offered to corporations and syndicates, it seems to me, contemplates a fixed purpose on the part of the advocates of this bill to retain the islands for all time to come as a colony, as a dependency of the United States.

Under the bill which we are now discussing, not only are these enormous tracts of land to be turned over to syndicates and corporations, but all kinds of franchises are to be granted. Capitalists are invited there with the offer of unusual inducements.

Under this bill the Philippine Commission, appointed by the President, some of whom are natives, and who have been appointed commissioners because they proved themselves traitors to their own people, and who have been rewarded with high and responsible positions on the Commission for their subserviency to the American powers, are to grant these franchises to whom ever they see fit, receiving in return for the same such compensation or no compensation, as they choose to determine.

The Commissioners, some of whom, as I said, are subservient natives, who have abandoned their own people in their great fight for independence, are given the power to lease lands in immense tracts to corporations for whatever rental they may fix upon. They can grant the privilege of cutting timber to such corporations as they may choose to befriend and on such terms as they may be disposed to make.

The Americans on the present board of commissioners are men of high character, but they may all be dead within a month, or they may come home. It is not reasonable to suppose that men of the character of Judge Taft can always be secured to undertake the task which he has imposed upon himself. As a general proposition, it is evident that the best men of the United States are not going to forsake their homes and their business and go over to the Philippines in order to administer the affairs of the islands on high and philanthropic planes. The men who seek these positions will be the usual class of place hunters, who regularly besiege each President when he comes into office for positions which carry handsome salaries. The passage of this bill must result in scandals which will cause us all kinds of humiliation.

Under the wise policy of the Republican party, before the Democratic slogan of the "markets of the world" took possession of that party, and they commenced buying foreign markets by buying islands for money or subduing them with the sword, we had become the greatest commercial nation in the world. I was fond of saying on the stump, when I occupied a seat on the other side of the Chamber, that the "home market" was the greatest market for the United States, and I assert now that within six months after you admit Arizona, New Mexico, and Oklahoma to statehood the profit to the manufacturers of the United States on their trade with any one of these new States will be greater than their combined profits on all of their trade with the Philippines and other oriental countries.

Our farm and manufactured products have become so great that they not only supply us, but go abroad. It has been demonstrated that no nation can compete with us in trade. Our trade has gone to the countries where there is a natural demand for our products, and it will continue to go to those countries which are similar to ourselves, who desire the things we desire, and who are not able to produce these things in sufficient quantities to supply their own wants.

We can not force trade with a people who can raise the things we offer to sell them and in greater quantities than is necessary to supply their own wants. We can not force oriental people into taking our goods, which they do not want and have no use for.

I commenced my remarks with the statement that if it could be demonstrated that there could be no commercial benefit to the United States in retaining the Philippine Islands as a colony, and if it could be demonstrated that the oriental trade was a menace and not a blessing, that we would quickly see our way clear to aiding the Filipinos to establish an independent government of their own.

I have not touched on the other very interesting phases of this great proposition which confronts us, but have contented myself with endeavoring to demonstrate that the oriental trade is a delusion and the advantage of the Philippines to us commercially is an idle Eutopian dream. Mr. President, it seems to me that the mission of our great Republic is to ameliorate the condition of the white man of the world. We started out by inviting all those who loved freedom of speech and conscience and liberty to pursue their own plans of life, under wise restraints, to come among us. We asked them to participate in our Government and to help us to administer it in justice to themselves and to all people. We stood as a beacon light of hope to the civilization of Europe and Asia, an inspiration to both. We held aloof from the political affairs of both. The hope of the white race of the world is not in tropical countries; it is not in Asia, in Africa, or in Europe.

Mr. President, the last refuge and inspiration to the struggling white people is in the United States and in British Columbia, to our north. West of the Missouri River and in British Columbia is enough rich, undeveloped country to sustain a population four times as large as the United States now contains. As this country and the South, with its undeveloped resources, is reclaimed by capital, substantial markets will be opened for all worthy business enterprises. Let us continue to invite the sturdy German, Swede, Norwegian, English, Welsh, Irish, and other white people to come to us and aid in opening up our great natural resources. Let us not seek to force trade with Orientals by making subjects of Malayans.

Who is to be benefited by this new departure? When we talk about trade with the Orient and the riches of the Philippines, which are to be opened to the investment of capital, who is to be benefited? The answer is quick and ready and admits of no denial. The capitalist is the one who will reap the harvest, and he will do it at the expense of all of the other people of the United States.

The advocates of the majority bill urge as one reason for its passage, and as one reason for holding the Philippine Islands and exploiting them, that they will be an open door to Chinese trade. We had better pause and ponder well before entering this new field. The dragon is sleeping quietly now. The monster is inert, surrounded with the conservatism of centuries of time, without motive to arouse itself, drugged with the philosophy of Mencius and Confucius, which deadens competition and ambition. Is it wise for us to pull this dragon's teeth and sow them broadcast over the Empire? The one monster has no desire to have dealings with us; has no desire to be stirred from his lethargy. For every tooth of this monster which we pluck and plant, thousands of active, irresistible dragons will spring up, whose energies will be devoted to devouring the world. All the earth outside of China will be their prey. Looking to the interest of the white laboring race of the world, are we pursuing a wise course in disturbing this sleeping dragon? [Manifestations of applause.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PLATT of Connecticut) rapped with his gavel.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I shall not at this late hour detain the Senate long, and indeed the many points made by the honorable Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS] deserve a reply at greater length than the time of day affords. But some points have been made which to my mind demand answer on the instant.

The Senator in his concluding remarks seemed to admit the proposition that the retention of the Philippine Islands would be an open door for the entry of American trade into China, but he said that there resided a dragon in China which we must not awaken. The whole argument has been an effort to frighten the American people with the dragon of China, and with that one dragon I had supposed the Senator's fertile imagination would pause. But no. One dragon was not sufficient. He must arouse a thousand dragons, though I do not know whence they are to come. "If you arouse the sleeping dragon of China," said the honorable Senator, "and pluck out and sow his teeth, you will create a thousand dragons." He referred by that, Mr. President, to the imaginary danger to American industries from Chinese competition—a danger as imaginary as the Senator's dragons.

The subtile argument of the Senator rests upon one fundamental misconception, the error of which it will not take very long to demonstrate. The Senator said that the Chinese, when they learned how to employ modern industry, when they imported modern machinery and modern methods of manufacture, would not only supply themselves, but would produce a surplus which would be a menace to our own production and trade, and that therefore instead of there being a possibility of increase for American exports to China and the Orient the exact reverse would be the consequence of any effort to extend our oriental commerce.

And so it was stated by the Senator from Idaho that it was our duty, so far as in us lay, not to encourage the development of China, because to the extent to which China was developed our own foreign trade would be menaced. Mr. President, is that true? If it is true at all, it is universally true. If it is true of one country, it is true of another country. If it is true that the development of China would not increase but decrease American trade with China, it is equally true that the development of Germany would not increase but decrease American trade with Germany. If it is true that, for a people whose labor is paid less wages a day than ours, to increase their agriculture, to increase their manufactures, to diversify their industries in general would be a menace to our trade, because we could not sell as much to them as before, but instead they would invade our own markets, then it would have been far better for us if Germany, instead of having developed into the magnificent industrial organization into which she has developed, had remained the forest land and the roaming people of a thousand years ago. The argument of the Senator from Idaho is that it would have been better for the American farmer and the American manufacturer, so far as trade with Germany is concerned, if Germany had remained without a factory and had remained without modern methods of agriculture.

But, Mr. President, is that the case? Certainly not. Steadily and rapidly our exports to Germany have increased. I looked up the figures while the Senator from Idaho was talking. In 1892 we sold to Germany $105,551,000 worth of American products, and in 1901 we sold Germany $191,780,000 worth of products.

According to the argument of the Senator from Idaho our trade with Germany ought to have decreased, because every day Germany's manufacturing industries and Germany's agricultural productiveness have increased. The argument of the Senator from Idaho is that when a foreign country to which we may export increases its industries our trade with it must decrease. Yet our trade with Germany steadily and rapidly increases, and it increases in proportion to the increase of German internal industry.

If this is true of Germany it is also true of France, and so the figures show. It is also true of England and of every country, and so the figures show. Up to a certain point the greater their internal development the larger our sales to them. If true of these countries, will the Senator from Idaho tell me why it will not also be true of China?

Apply the Senator's argument to our own conditions here at home. The Senator's argument is that the farmers of Illinois will be endangered by the prosperity of the farmers of Iowa; that as the farmers of Iowa increase their industrial productiveness they will more and more compete with the farmers of Illinois, and therefore that it is to the disadvantage of the farmers of Illinois for Iowa to be developed. Who believes that? And who can believe that it is to the disadvantage of the manufacturing industries of the United States for Germany to be developed; that it is to the disadvantage of the exporters of the United States for China to be developed? Yet that is the argument of the Senator from Idaho, an argument refuted by all the facts, because the places where our export trade has increased most rapidly are the places where the internal industries of those countries have increased more rapidly. And up to a certain point this is a universal truth of commerce.

So it is that following the example of Germany, of England, of France, as their internal development and that of every country increases, their purchases from us increase.

Yet the converse of that plain proposition is the sophistry upon which the whole argument of the Senator from Idaho rests. Upon the surface it looks plausible and reasonable that if a country to whom we are selling our products increases her products of course our sales to her must decrease. But it is not true, Mr. President, as a matter of fact, nor is the reason hard to find, because as a country to whom we sell our goods diversifies its industries, increases its productiveness the wants of its people also increase, and the capacity of that people to purchase what we make also increases.

And so it is that if Germany, France, England, and every other country increases in intelligence, increases in productiveness, increases in diversification of industry, our sales to them also increase. They want more and they have more money wherewith to supply their expanding desires.

Can any Senator point out to me why this same law would not work with China? Of course it will work with China. As her mines are opened, as railroads are builded, as industries are diversified, as the best methods of agriculture call from her soil those products for which they are most fitted, as schools enlarge her people's intelligence, the wants of those people will increase as the wants of the German people increased, with the increase of their internal industry and intelligence, and as those wants increase our opportunity to supply them will increase.

I was very glad that the Senator afforded me an excellent illustration to support this plain law of commerce in using an illustration for himself to support his proposition. He spoke of Japan; and yet everybody knows that Japan's productiveness has increased more in the last twenty-five years than in all her history, so far as her exports are concerned. Has that meant a decrease of American exports to Japan? I was out for a moment, but I understood that the Senator said while I was absent that our trade was falling off with Japan; and it was necessary for his argument that he should so state. But while he was speaking I looked up that point, and I will read for the information of the Senator and of the Senate the facts about it. In 1892 our exports to Japan were $3,000,000 and a little over.

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President, of course I am quite willing that the Senator shall read it. I did not make such a statement, however. So there will be no point in the Senator reading it in answer to a statement which was not made.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very good. Then I will simply sum up the facts about it for the argument that I am now making, to show the fallacy of the Senator's proposition that the development of China means the destruction of American exports to China. Japan has developed, and as Japan has developed our exports to Japan have increased. It is true that in 1901 there was a decrease of $10,000,000, but the increase from 1892 to 1900 had steadily grown from $3,000,000 a year to $29,000,000 a year.

Does not the Senator know why there was a falling off in 1901? The world knows it so well that I shall not take the time of the Senate to animadvert upon it. We know the troubles in China just at that time. We know the paralysis of trade in the East at that time. We know the closing of the markets to much of Japan's exports to China at that time, and therefore the decrease of her demands from us. That is one explanation of that falling off. But generally our exports to Japan have increased so that where we sold Japan $3,000,000 worth of our products, in 1900 we sold Japan $29,000,000 worth of our products.

Now, Mr. President, if it is true that as Germany industrially and manufacturally has developed our sales to her have increased, if it is true that as Japan has industrially developed our sales to her have increased, why would it not also be true that as China develops industrially our sales to China will increase?

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, that is precisely what has occurred. Within ten years our sales to China alone have increased more than 100 per cent. The whole trade in exports by all the nations of the world to China is from $250,000,000 to $285,000,000. By reason of our geographical location at least 50 per cent of that trade ought to be ours. The Senator admits that the Philippines, if China's trade is worth having, is an open door to that trade. It being established that 50 per cent of an export trade of $250,000,000 to $285,000,000 is worth having, it is therefore demonstrated that the Philippines, as a door to that trade (which the Senator admits), are also worth having. And if China now buys $250,000,000 from the world, developed China will buy $1,000,000,000 from the world.

Mr. President, I was interested in the question of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the remarks made thereon in support of the general proposition of the Senator from Idaho about the trade of England with India. I shall not go into that at large to-night any further than to illustrate the general proposition which I am now arguing. The hour is too late for comprehensive comment. But one fact may be noted in passing. England sells to India every year something in the neighborhood of $200,000,000 worth of English exports. Is that little item of trade worth having? To the Malay Straits Settlements England sells every year something over $15,000,000 worth of exports. To the little island of Ceylon England sells every year something over $10,000,000 worth of exports. England sells to her dependencies and through her trade centers to the Orient something over $500,000,000 of English exports every year.

I should like to ask the Senator or any person who holds the opposite view what he thinks would become of the English factories if that export trade of $500,000,000 a year was taken away from them. I fancy that if England was suddenly bereft of her opportunity to sell $500,000,000 worth of goods a year which goes to her dependencies and the Orient and not to her self-governing colonies there would be a bankruptcy throughout commercial and manufacturing England within a few months that would largely resemble the bankruptcy in manufacturing and commercial circles some years ago in this country. And yet, the Senator tells us that oriental trade is a dangerous dream.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. Does the Senator assume that if England did not hold those countries as dependencies she would have no trade with them?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I assume that she would not have nearly so great a trade with them, and the facts so prove.

Mr. CARMACK. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. The facts prove that England's exports to practically every one of her colonies and dependencies have been decreasing for a number of years, while the trade of the United States with the colonies and dependencies of Great Britain has been increasing.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes; and, Mr. President, the causes of the beginning of the decline of English trade are well known, I doubt not, to so careful a student as the Senator. The Senator well knows that it is too late an hour in the evening to enter into a large and extended discussion of the causes for that decline. I would have been glad if this matter had been taken up earlier in the debate in order that upon a subject so interesting all the facts could be given. The main ones, however, may be summed up briefly.

England enjoyed a monopoly of trade so long that she ceased to fear competition. She rested on her oars; she ceased to cater to the desires of the people to whom she sold as to the quality and style of the goods or how they should be shipped and all the other points of commercial advance and supremacy whereas other nations, more modern, more active, sought out what goods the people wanted and how they wanted them delivered. Thus in spite of England's advantage her more alert rivals began to undermine her trade. Does the Senator mean to say that the beginning of the decline of England's trade is due to her policy of holding dependencies?

Mr. CARMACK. No; what I mean to say is that it simply enforces the lesson that it is not necessary to have dependencies in order to increase the foreign trade of a country.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Now, let us see about that, Mr. President. England sells to China every year $120,000,000 worth of English products. Most of those she sells through her distributing center at Hongkong.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CARMACK. If the Senator will permit me I will state further that for a series of years Great Britain's exports to Hongkong have been steadily declining.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Yes, and for the reason stated and many more, none of which have anything to do with the holding of dependencies. I will state to the Senator that if it had not been for the conserving influence of her dependencies, of her great distributing centers, England's trade, with her ancient methods of catering to the people, would have been abolished a decade ago because of the advance of modern methods in merchandising by her rivals.

Mr. President, it is very fashionable to say in some scholastic quarters that the way to get trade is to make goods well and sell them cheap, and that you do not need distributing posts. There is not a grocery store, there is not a merchandise establishment in any town of this country that can not tell the Senator better than that. Suppose you take the best goods made in this country and sell them at the cheapest price, and put them at some inaccessible portion of any county in this country, will their quality and their cheapness of price sell the goods?

No; but if while you are doing that another more enterprising merchant should take an inferior quality of goods at a higher price and locate them conveniently to the people and allow the people to know about them, he would sell his inferior goods and be prosperous while you would keep your superior goods and go into bankruptcy.

So this simple illustration shows that quality and price are not the only elements in the sale of goods, either by men or firms or nations. Accessibility, location, advertisement, convenience, spheres of commercial influence, are qualities quite as important and quite as immediate in their effects and results as quality and price. But those are items of practical moment which scholasticism refuses to consider; and so it is that the practical judgment of merchants and the practical instincts of merchants and mercantile nations are much better than the theories of theorists.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. Do I understand the Senator's argument to imply that it is necessary for the United States to follow the example of England and hold possessions and territories throughout the world in order to extend its foreign trade?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I am answering the argument of the Senator from Idaho. I do not want to continue long, but I will take the time to answer the question of the Senator from Tennessee.

My argument on this point is sufficiently put when I say that the American people are at least not willing to give up the vantage point of commerce when once events and honor have thrown it into their hands.

I did not originally refer to the commercial advantages of dependencies, Mr. President. The commercial aspects of this case were brought up by the opposition. But when the opposition brings them up; when the Senator from Idaho attempts to show to the people of this country that in seeking oriental trade we are not acquiring a mine of commercial wealth, but that we are plunging into commercial disaster; when he attempts to frighten the American merchants by imaginary Chinese dragons, it becomes pertinent for me to point out the advantages that accrue to us.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. The Senator from Indiana, I think, was one of the first men to bring up the question of the commercial advantages of colonialism in the very remarkably able speech which he made here on the floor of the Senate two or three years ago. I wanted to know whether the Senator still held to the opinion which he then seemed to hold, that this country, in order to extend its foreign trade, ought to enter upon a general colonial policy. I do not know that I understand him now; but that was his argument at that time.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator caught but one phase of the speech which he is so good as to compliment. This I will say upon that question, that whatever conduces to the commercial welfare of this country and whatever keeps the American workingman employed is a subject worthy of consideration in the determination of a nation's policy. And when——

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Pardon me; I want to get through.

Mr. CARMACK. I have no power to pardon the Senator, but still——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Go ahead and ask the question.

Mr. CARMACK. No.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Go on. The only point about it was I did not want to take so much time.

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator from Tennessee will proceed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I hope he will. I only wanted to get through.

Mr. CARMACK. I should like to have the Senator answer my question.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. What is that?

Mr. CARMACK. The Senator was arguing in favor of the advantages of a general colonial policy. I asked him the question two or three times, which he has not yet answered, as to whether for the purpose of extending its foreign trade this country ought to enter and would be justified in entering upon a general colonial policy?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, a sufficient answer to that question is that such a proposition is not before the Senate or the American people, and when it arises we will answer it quite as frankly as we answer the policy in reference to the Philippine Islands. When it is attempted to be shown that the Philippines should be given up because they are a commercial danger, and when after stating that fallacious proposition the experience of England in India is given to support it, then it becomes pertinent for me to point out the advantages to England from holding India, Malay Straits Settlements, and all her dependencies.

Mr. CARMACK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. The Senator has spoken of India. I am not going to enter into an argument on that subject this evening, of course. I wish simply to suggest to the Senator that India, speaking of it in a commercial point of view, with 250,000,000 people, buys from all the world just about twice as much as the 5,000,000 people in Canada. I will say, further, that it is the opinion of a number of English statesmen and students that the possession of India is a positive disadvantage to Great Britain.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I wish the Senator would keep on the floor, because I think I will answer that by asking him a question. Would he say that because Canada consumes more than India that therefore England ought not also to embrace the market of India; that is, would he say that because a merchant had exploited one field he should not also advance to another? Is not this rather the correct inference to be drawn from the Senator's statement—Canada buys so much because the consuming capacity of her people is so great?

Mr. CARMACK. Of course.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The consuming capacity of her people rises with diversified industries and increased intelligence. Therefore it follows that it is a very good thing for commerce to educate the people of India and diversify their industries and increase their intelligence. Thus we see that, working along the lines of Providence or nature, or what you please to call it, commercial advantage and the highest duty travel on parallel lines.

Mr. CARMACK. The point I was making was that India, considering all the vast expense and trouble and liability which it imposes upon the British Empire, is a very poor market.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How much expense does it impose upon England?

Mr. CARMACK. It has imposed on England a great deal.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. How much now?

Mr. CARMACK. I do not know exactly how much in the past, but it has imposed a good deal.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does not the Senator know India is self-supporting?

Mr. CARMACK. No; I do not know that it is self-supporting. I know that during a period of famine, which frequently occurs, it is not self-supporting.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. India pays every cent of her expenses and costs England nothing, and the same is true of the Philippines. Every dollar of the expense of civil government in the Philippines is paid exclusively out of the Philippine revenues, and civil government in the Philippines does not cost the American people a penny. Famines? Famines have occurred in India, but what bearing have famines in India on the question of expense?

Mr. CARMACK. Of course——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Famines drain every country that has a heart of generosity; but that has nothing to do with the commercial feature we are discussing. We ourselves help every famine-stricken people. What has that to do with this commercial question and the other question of expense of India to England?

Mr. CARMACK. It has a great deal to do with India, because famine is one of its particular industries.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is witty, and I will not say what I was about to remark, because I think too much of the Senator.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama will state his point of order.

Mr. PETTUS. I think that this discussion as carried on is contrary to the rules of the Senate and ought to be stopped.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am very willing for the Senator from Tennessee to interrupt me.

Mr. CARMACK. With the permission of the Senator from Indiana——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. My point was that the people of India live always upon the verge of famine and after one hundred and fifty years of British rule that is the permanent condition of the people. Even in times of plenty they earn barely enough to keep soul and body together, and a year of ordinary scarcity, which would simply mean a little enforced economy for other people, means a famine in India. Therefore it is a natural burden upon Great Britain.

I will say, furthermore, and the fact can be demonstrated, that the people of India are in no whit better condition to-day than they were the day they came under the rule of the British Empire. The wages paid to a laborer in India to-day are about 6 cents, and they never could have been much less than that. The people there live constantly upon the very verge of starvation.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator said that two times. I yielded to him to say it once, and he has repeated it twice.

Mr. President, if there is any pertinency in the Senator's remarks about famine in India it is to compare India with the Philippine Islands. Before the Senator makes his case about India being a drain on England because there is famine there he must establish the parallel proposition that there is continual famine in the Philippines, which will therefore be a drain upon us, because the Senator is drawing the parallel of India against us, and he must make the parallel complete.

Mr. CARMACK. The Senator drew the parallel of India; I did not.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Maine drew the parallel of India in establishing what they said was a fact, that oriental trade was not worth having.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator from Indiana allow me to ask the Senator from Tennessee a question?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator from Tennessee suppose that we ratified the treaty and took the Philippines for the dollar?

Mr. CARMACK. Yes, sir; exactly.

Mr. SPOONER. So far as I am concerned——

Mr. CARMACK. I acquit the Senator from Wisconsin. I do not believe he did.

Mr. SPOONER. So far as I am concerned, that is a defamatory impeachment.

Mr. CARMACK. As I did not impeach the Senator, he has no right to say it is defamatory.

Mr. SPOONER. And I want to say that, so far as I know, that is not true of any member of the Senate.

Mr. CARMACK. I know what is in the RECORD. I know what Senators said.

Mr. SPOONER. Who?

Mr. CARMACK. The Senator from Montana, Mr. Carter, at that time a great leader of the Republican party.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. CARMACK. And I know what the Senator from Indiana said.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The pertinency of this discussion at this time is the point which the Senator from Idaho attempted to make, that the Philippines were an open door to China and that the Chinese foreign trade, instead of being an advantage to us, was a menace. Therefore it became necessary very briefly to show how it was an advantage. That is the pertinency of this debate, and that is its logical sequence.

Mr. SPOONER. I quite agree with my friend from Indiana that the argument is pertinent and legitimate, but for one I protest, and I think on behalf of every man almost in the Senate, against the assumption by the Senator from Tennessee that in ratifying the Paris treaty the Senate attempted to reduce the question to the standard of the dollar.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

Mr. CARMACK. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. CARMACK. In reply to what the Senator says about defamatory impeachment, I do not know that that is exactly parliamentary, but we are not in the habit of calling people to order on this side of the Chamber for saying unpleasant things and I do not care for it myself. I pass it by with indifference. But I say it was proclaimed upon the very floor of the Senate by distinguished Republican Senators—by Senator Carter from Montana—that the question of sentiment or religion had nothing to do with it; that it was simply a question of the dollar. I remember the language used by Senator Carter of Montana, and I could quote also to the Senator the statement recently made by the new Secretary of the Treasury, that it was selfishness as much as anything else that led us into this business.

Mr. SPOONER. That is the opinion of an individual.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Every man will speak for himself.

Mr. CARMACK. He was a very distinguished leader of the Republican party, however.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, if the Senators are through——

Mr. DUBOIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly.

Mr. DUBOIS. I have listened to the Senator from Indiana with a great deal of pleasure, but he is utterly mistaken about my argument. He has been misquoting me constantly, and basing his argument on misquotations.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I shall be glad to be corrected by the Senator if I have misquoted him.

Mr. DUBOIS. For instance, I said that the argument the advocates of this bill use as one reason why we should pass it is that it would be an open door to China. I did not undertake to prove that it would be an open door to China. In every other respect the Senator has utterly mistaken my argument, but I can not attempt now to go into the argument again.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am delighted to have the Senator set himself right in my mind, and I will say in the minds of many others. But I will ask the Senator if he did not devote one-third of his speech to showing that in respect to trade with China, instead of being a benefit to us, it would be a menace, and that the development of that country would be a misfortune to the United States; is not that correct?

Mr. DUBOIS. Absolutely.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is absolutely correct. Therefore I started out to show if that was true as to China it must also be true as to Germany and France and Japan, for the figures show that as those countries develop industrially our exports to them increase; and if that be true as to them the same thing must necessarily be true as to China. The Senator's argument, as now corrected by him, is that even if our contention is true, that the Philippines are a doorway to China's trade, that trade is not only not worth having, but actually dangerous.

Mr. DUBOIS. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] that there are a few things left in this world outside of the profits in dollars and cents.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. And the reason I am now speaking of the profits in dollars and cents is because the whole argument of the Senator from Idaho was devoted to that point, to show that this experiment was not profitable, and for the reason of the expense in dollars and cents we should give up the Philippines.

Now, the Senator says that we do not want to consider the argument of dollars and cents, although his whole speech was made to show that because of the argument of profit and loss we ought to leave the Philippines. His argument was exclusively commercial. I heard no moral appeal of any sort in the Senator's address, but I heard a very careful and a very subtle argument to show that this whole business was unprofitable; and that is what I am answering now.

It is very late and there have been many interruptions, so I shall not go on with much I had noted down here; but I wish to refer to just one thing which appears to show inconsistency on the Senator's part. He spoke of syndicates taking these lands, and yet the Senator knows that in this bill it is provided that no corporation shall own more than 5,000 acres of land, and that it is within the power of the Commission absolutely to prevent them owning more. He knows that, as to private holdings, there is an absolute prohibition in the bill that any person having those holdings shall sell or lease or demise them; and yet the Senator says that this whole scheme is a scheme of exploitation by corporations and syndicates.

But the Senator refuted himself, as is often the case in oversubtle arguments, because he cited as an illustration the protest of the Philippine Development Company, was it not?

Mr. DUBOIS. Yes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. They protest against what, Mr. President? Is it the protest that they are not going to get more land of which the Senator complains? No; it is a protest against our Government taking these vast quantities of land from this corporation to give to small private holders.

The only instance, Mr. President, that the Senator was able to show in support of this alleged danger of the great holdings of land by syndicates was an illustration of precisely the reverse; and that is that one great syndicate is now protesting that the Government is about to take away its vast holdings and distribute them amongst small holders.

Mr. DUBOIS. Why were they protesting, I will ask the Senator?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The Senator is more familiar with their protest than I am. Will the Senator state why they are protesting?

Mr. DUBOIS. They are protesting because the Government is selling these lands, claiming that they are friars' lands, when, as a matter of fact, they claim that the land belongs to them.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Does the Senator mean to say that the protest would not have been made if the Government had merely taken their lands and distributed them among small holders, irrespective of the friars? Would not they have protested just the same?

Mr. DUBOIS. How could the Government take lands belonging to me, for instance, over in the Philippines?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is not the question. The question that I desire to hold the Senator to is this: He complained because the bill was going to make this a great scheme for corporate exploitation, and the only illustration he offered was the case of a corporation that was protesting against its lands being taken from it and distributed among the people, which is a destruction by his own example of his original proposition.

Now, Mr. President, only one point more——

Mr. DUBOIS. We are just simply going round and round again. They are protesting because the Government said these lands belong to the friars, whereas they claim the Government was selling lands which belonged to this company.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the Government was breaking up a great land monopoly in the islands; and yet the Senator says it is the business of this bill to create corporate monopolies, and cites in support of his criticism the protest of this land company against our taking its lands and distributing them among the people. The Senator says we go round and round, and I think that is true. The Senator goes round and round, and I am following him as rapidly as possible. That is why we are going round and round. I am trying to reply to the Senator as fast as I can.

There is just one other point to which I shall refer among the many which I had noted but shall not mention. The Senator, with a gravity which amounted to pathos—and I should like to be honored with the Senator's attention, as I honored him with mine.

Mr. DUBOIS. I am listening to the Senator.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I say that the Senator, with a gravity that rose to the tremulous point of pathos in his voice, said we have nothing the Filipinos want; that the natives of India wanted nothing that England had, and that trade with the Orient is not only a myth, but a destructive delusion. That is what the Senator said.

Mr. President, the whole world sells to the Philippine Islands every year, and did while Spain was there, something like $30,000,000 worth. The Senator from Idaho said that all of that was consumed by the foreign residents. He said that everything we would sell to the Philippines would be consumed by the foreign residents. He said that exports to tropical regions were consumed by the foreigners living there. I ask the Senator from Idaho to consider the enormous consuming capacity of those few Spaniards and Englishmen there who could consume $30,000,000 worth of imports that every year were sold to the Philippines. Does he not think, on reflection, that the Filipinos consumed some of that $30,000,000 of imports; that the people of India consumed a little of the $200,000,000 of England's exports to India? Does not the Senator really think that the few hundred Englishmen in the Straits Settlements could hardly use all of the $15,000,000 of products imported there from England? The $30,000,000 worth of exports to the Philippines when those people are educated, when their trade and commerce amounts to something more than barter, which, as the testimony shows, is all they have now, when roads traverse those islands, when plantations are joined together where it is now a wilderness, when the whole country is developed—not exploited, as you choose to name it—when there are schools in every place as there are here, the consuming capacity of that people will rise to the high average of civilized life, and the $30,000,000 of imports which now go to the Philippine Islands will rise at least to ten times that amount.

Ought we not to have the bulk of that trade in the Philippines? We have an illustration to show that we shall have all of it. Before Hawaii came to us she bought something like $15,000,000 worth of imports from all the world. We sold her less than one-third. She came beneath our flag, and to-day we sell her practically the whole of her importations. Suppose only one-half of that result should be true of the Philippines; suppose that education, roads, railroads, the development of the country lift the consuming capacity of that people only five times, that would be $150,000,000 a year; and if we get only one-half of that that would be $75,000,000 of American exports to the Philippines alone. But a little thing like that is of no consequence to the Senator from Idaho.

I am showing, Mr. President, with great brevity that it is not true that the goods imported into the Philippine Islands, into India, and into the Malay Straits Settlements are not consumed by the foreign residents among those people, but by the people themselves. Do the few thousand Englishmen who live in India consume the entire $200,000,000 worth of English exports to that country? Do those few hundred Englishmen who live in the Malay Straits Settlements consume the entire $15,000,000 worth of exports which England alone sells to those people? Do the few Englishmen in England's dependencies consume the hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of English exports sent to them? The Senator said so, but is it possible, does the Senator think?

I put it to the Senator again, or to any Senator, that this oriental trade is worth getting. What would happen to England's commerce, to England's manufactures, to England's industry, if the $500,000,000 that her dependencies and the Orient purchase from her yearly was suddenly taken away from her?

I repeat again that there would be something in that country of bankruptcy, commercially and industrially, which we witnessed in this country under a recent unfortunate régime.

I do not wish to take more time of the Senate, but I want to suggest to the Senator from Idaho that the opposite of his views is held by the shrewdest merchants of the world and by the shrewdest mercantile nations of the world, and is their settled policy. The opposite of his views is held by the commercial communities of Germany, by the commercial communities of England, and by the commercial communities of every modern industrial nation.

Can it be true, Mr. President, that all of those men, and not one, but all modern and advancing commercial nations, are wrong, and that it has been left to the Senator from Idaho to discover the real truth of this matter? Can it be that the greatest commercial nation of the world, England, that the most advancing commercial nation of the world to-day, Germany, or that even France, who has had to prosecute the same policy—that all of their merchants were so unanimous in this matter that it became national—have made a profound mistake, and that Germany, England, and all successful commercial nations should abandon their mistaken ideas and now take advice upon foreign commerce from the distinguished Senator from Idaho? Yet that is the proposition which his speech must meet.

Mr. HOAR. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly, gladly.

Mr. HOAR. I ask it in absolute good faith, as, of course, I do not suppose the Senator will doubt. I do not ask it with the view of making a point against his argument.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I shall be very much honored to have the Senator ask me any question he desires.

Mr. HOAR. I ask the Senator the question simply for light on the subject, no matter how or where it cuts. The question is, Do England's dependencies furnish her more trade than is furnished by the free nations of similar populations with whom she deals?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No, sir. I see the Senator's proposition.

Mr. HOAR. The question is whether a dependency or a free customer is better.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I see the Senator's proposition, Mr. President, and I answered it before the Senator came into the room, for the same point was raised before. The answer is this: Because her self-governing colonies, peopled by her own people, with their vast consuming capacity, purchase more of her than her dependencies which have people of a lower consuming capacity, is no reason why she should abandon the latter market. The answer is, Mr. President, that a merchant, if he is progressive and prosperous, after he exploits one market proceeds to another and exploits that.

Mr. HOAR. But the proposition I put went a little farther and a little deeper than that; and that is whether for England the free customer is not better than the dependency. For instance, suppose England governed us to-day——

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I understand the Senator's proposition, if he will pardon me——

Mr. HOAR. Would we be a better customer for her governing us than we are governing ourselves?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. No; if the Senator will pardon me, that was hardly the former question. Here is the converse of the Senator's question, and I put it to the Senator: Did England sell more to India when England's flag did not fly over India than England sells India to-day? That is the question, Mr. President.

Mr. CARMACK. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I will; but I intended to get through before this time. I will yield to the Senator, however.

Mr. CARMACK. In reply to the question put by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], I believe it to be a fact, although I will not state it with absolute confidence, that England sells more of her manufactured goods to Germany and France than to all her colonies and possessions combined.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, the greatest per cent of England's trade is with her colonies. The Senator is not correct. But granting that the Senator were correct——

Mr. CARMACK rose.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I am going to grant the Senator's statement for the sake of the argument. Suppose, Mr. President, that the Senator's statement were true, does the Senator draw from that the conclusion that England should therefore abandon her colonial markets and the markets of her dependencies?

Mr. CARMACK. Not at all, Mr. President.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then, where is the pertinency of the inquiry?

Mr. CARMACK. It is this: That England is not compelled to hold countries as dependencies in order to trade with them. She might have just as great a trade with those countries which she holds as dependencies if they were not her depencencies.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Ah, Mr. President, there is the usual opposition "might." But what is the fact? Let the Senator not argue on the "mights" and "supposes" and "it would be's," but on what is true.

Mr. CARMACK. Then, Mr. President, I will tell the Senator what is true.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Well, I shall be glad to be instructed by the Senator from Tennessee as to what is true at any time. It will be a novelty.

Mr. CARMACK. And that is, that the United States and Germany, which have no authority at all over England's possessions, have for many years been steadily increasing their exports to those possessions, while England's own exports to her own possessions have been steadily declining.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, at this late hour the Senator suggests a fact here, of which I doubt not he knows the causes, and which he knows it is impossible to intelligently go into at this late hour, just as he did a while ago about the decline of England's trade, but does the Senator not know that the reason why France, Germany, and ourselves can go into the ports of England's dependencies and compete there with her is because she opens those ports freely to us, and because of the fact that for thirty years England enjoyed a monopoly of that trade, and through overconfidence has fallen into such a state of commercial lethargy that she does not make goods that the people want any more, she does not ask them how they want them delivered, but Germany does that, France does that, and we do that, and we enter her ports with equal freedom with her, and therefore her trade has decreased and ours has increased. Those are some of the reasons.

Mr. CARMACK rose.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. If the Senator will pardon me, if he had at an earlier time in the day suggested these complex questions I should have been delighted to have gone into it. I am ready to discuss this engaging subject at any time when it is sufficiently early in the day to go exhaustively into it.

But, Mr. President, one more point, one more fallacy, which it occurs to me was the crowning fallacy and the final and ultimate sophistry of the speech of the Senator from Idaho, and I think it was the most pathetic point of the many pathetic points he made, and it was this:

He said it stands against reason that we can furnish men like Governor Taft; it stands against reason that if Taft was to die there could be another man like Taft produced. He said our Commission may be dead in thirty days; they are splendid men; who knows but they may die, and because they may die we had better give up the Philippine Islands. Why, he said, where can you produce another Taft? Why, Mr. President, no man on earth admires Governor Taft more than I. Yet there is another equally successful administrator, and not far away. Indeed he will arrive here next week. Gen. Leonard Wood, of Cuba, is another like Taft. Gen. Luke Wright is another like Taft; and, Mr. President, all over this great Republic of 80,000,000 people will be found men like Taft and Wood and Wright, the best administrators in the world. And the fact that they are American administrators is not against them.

Mr. President, we do not fail when a railroad company's president dies to find in some place a man of equal ability and equal energy to engineer that great enterprise, and yet the argument of the Senator from Idaho would cause us to dismantle every railroad in this country, because he would say, "Where can you get another president like this?" The argument of the Senator from Idaho would cause us to disestablish this Republic, because he would say, "Where can you find another President like Lincoln or McKinley, or like any other great and wise President?" Mr. President, the American people is the greatest reservoir of intelligence, power, and moral force and energy in this world, and when one man steps out of this great host of 80,000,000 of the mightiest, noblest, and best people in the world an abundance of the best administrators of the world can be found to take the vacant place and to carry on the great work of law, order, civilization, and the regeneration of our dominions wherever floats our blessed flag.

Mr. TELLER. I offer an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment intended to be proposed by the Senator from Colorado will be received, printed, and ordered to lie on the table.

JAMES W. LONG.

Mr. BURROWS. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 282) providing for the appointment of James W. Long, late a captain in the United States Army, a captain of infantry, and for placing his name on the retired list.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment, in line 8, after the word "battle," to strike out "with the rank and pay of a captain of infantry, retired;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint James W. Long, late captain in the United States Army, a captain of infantry, and to thereupon place his name upon the unlimited retired list of the Army, in the class whose disabilities result from wounds received in battle.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 36 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 26, 1902, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate May 23, 1902.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

ARTILLERY CORPS.

To be first lieutenants, to rank from September 23, 1901.

Frank E. Hopkins, at large, late first lieutenant, Forty-sixth Infantry, United States Volunteers (now second lieutenant, Artillery Corps, United States Army), to fill an original vacancy.

Homer B. Grant, of Massachusetts, late first lieutenant, Twenty-sixth Infantry, United States Volunteers (now second lieutenant, Artillery Corps, United States Army), to fill an original vacancy.

John W. C. Abbott, at large, late first lieutenant, Thirtieth Infantry, United States Volunteers (now second lieutenant, Artillery Corps, United States Army), to fill an original vacancy.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 23, 1902.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, a privileged report.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York calls up a privileged report.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I offer the report of the conference committee on the Agricultural appropriation bill, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, and I give notice that I will ask for its adoption on Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up the conference report on the Agricultural appropriation bill. The report and statement will be printed in the RECORD in pursuance of the rule adopted yesterday.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman did not state that he had a statement to accompany the report, but I assume that there is one.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; the statement accompanies it.

The conference report and statement are as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 13895) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1903, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 13, 21, 40, 55, and 65.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 22, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 30, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 51, 52, 53, 54, 57, 61, 63, 64, and 67, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 14: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 14, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$110,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 23: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$612,730;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 29: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 29, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$254,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 31: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 31, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$291,860;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 50: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 50, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In line 3 of said amendment, after the word "report," insert the words: ", giving his reasons;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 56: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 56, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$10,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 58: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 58, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$8,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 59: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 59, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$18,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 60: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 60, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$796,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 62: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 62, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$796,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 66: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 66, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$65,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

J. W. WADSWORTH,
E. S. HENRY,
H. D. ALLEN,
Managers on the part of the House.

REDFIELD PROCTOR,
H. C. HANSBROUGH,
WM. B. BATE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Statement to accompany conference report on H. R. 13895.

The increases in salaries (covered by amendments numbered 5, 7, 8, 9, 24, 32, 37, 42, and 45) agreed to by your conferees are as follows:

No. 5. The zoologist of Bureau of Animal Industry increased from $2,250 to $2,500.

No. 7. The Chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry increased from $3,000 to $4,000.

Nos. 24, 32, and 37. The chiefs of the bureaus of Forestry, of Chemistry, and of Soils each increased from $3,000 to $3,500.

Nos. 42 and 45. The chiefs of the divisions of Entomology and Biology increased from $2,500 to $2,750.

No. 8. The assistant chief of the Bureau of Plant Industry from $2,500 to $2,750.

No. 9. The chief clerk of the Bureau of Plant Industry from $1,800 to $2,000.

These increases were agreed to because your conferees believe them just and proper and not above the amounts paid for similar services by public and private institutions throughout the country. One additional cataloguer was allowed in the Library (amendment 54) at $1,000.

The following increases in the lump-sum appropriations (covered by amendments Nos. 14, 29, 58, 60, and 66) were agreed to:

No. 14, for pathological investigations	$10,000
No. 29, for Bureau of Forestry	9,000
No. 58, for Library	1,000
No. 60, for experiment stations	4,000
No. 66, for irrigation investigations	15,000

These increases, after further investigation and consideration, were not considered excessive, and were agreed to.

The item (amendment No. 3) for the construction of 6 buildings and the purchase of sites for same for use as Weather Bureau observatories, stricken from the bill in the House on a point of order, was reinserted by the Senate, and agreed to by your conferees.

The clause directing the Secretary of Agriculture to transfer to the Weather Bureau the Division of Statistics was amended (amendment No. 50) so as to direct the Secretary of Agriculture to report at the next session of Congress whether it is advisable to consolidate under the Weather Bureau all work of the Department of Agriculture relating to the gathering and compilation of crop reports and statistics, and if so to submit a plan for such consolidation.

All the other amendments were immaterial, being mere corrections of totals and slight typographical alterations.

The net increase in the amount carried by the bill as agreed to above the amount carried by the bill as it passed the House is $93,920, and the increase over the appropriation for the current fiscal year is $631,040.

STORM-WARNING STATIONS, SOUTH MANITOU ISLAND, LAKE MICHIGAN.

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1464) to establish storm-warning stations at South Manitou Island, Lake Michigan.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $15,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, repairing, and operating, under the direction of the Secretary of Agriculture, telegraph or telephone lines between Glenhaven, Mich., and South Manitou Island, Lake Michigan, and for the establishment, equipment, and maintenance of storm-warning stations at those points.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that this bill or a similar one was presented a few days ago. Reserving the right to object, I should be glad if the gentleman would give us some explanation about it.

Mr. BISHOP. This is the same bill that I spoke to the gentleman about the other day. It was not called up at that time.

Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill——

The SPEAKER. Let us have unanimous consent first.

Mr. RICHARDSON of Tennessee. I shall not object to its consideration, Mr. Speaker. It is a bill which belongs to a class that, it seems to me, the majority should take care of.

Mr. PAYNE. I should like to have an explanation of the bill.

Mr. BISHOP. I will ask the Clerk to read the report, which gives a full explanation.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1464) to establish wind-signal display stations at South Manitou Island, Lake Michigan, make a favorable report on the same.

Several years ago wind-display signals were established on the islands of Thunder Bay, Lake Huron, by laying a cable from the mainland to the islands and thus establishing telephonic communication with the light-house. This service proved so advantageous to lake traffic that the vessel owners have petitioned to have a like service established in Lake Michigan.

South Manitou Island is a harbor of refuge for vessels going to and coming from Chicago, and in stormy weather as many as a dozen large vessels seek shelter under the lee of that island. There is now no way in which these vessels can be reported or by which they can get assistance when it may be necessary.

Moreover, South Manitou signals would be in the highest degree important for vessels that traverse Lake Michigan, since they would be the only available signals between the Straits of Mackinac and Chicago.

The demand is great, the cost (not over $15,000) is small, and the operating expenses would be nothing, because the light-house keeper would perform the necessary work.

A petition, as follows, has been signed by hundreds of vessel owners and navigators of Detroit, Milwaukee, Chicago, Cape Vincent, N. Y.; South Haven, Mich.; Ogdensburg, N. Y.; Grand Haven, Mich., and Oswego, N. Y.:

The Congress of the United States, Washington, D. C.:

The undersigned, residents of Port Huron, Mich., and vicinity, owners, managers, and masters, representing the maritime interests of the Great Lakes, respectfully petition you for the establishment of cable service from South Manitou Harbor light-house, Lake Michigan, to the mainland at Glen Haven, by telephone connecting with the Western Union Telegraph Company at latter place, which, if established, will be of material benefit to shipping interests. South Manitou Harbor is one of the most natural on the lakes, and is about the only one between the Straits of Mackinac and Chicago which vessels, especially of the larger class, can safely enter.

The island is also a dangerous one for wrecks, which, occurring generally in stormy weather, makes it impossible to reach mainland to secure assistance, the result of which is at times very disastrous. It is also used extensively by vessels seeking shelter who are without means of communicating their whereabouts to their owners, managers, or others interested. Vessels lay there storm bound for days at a time. In fact, in the early and latter part of the season of navigation crafts are always at anchor there. A report kept for one season showed in the neighborhood of 400 vessels making use of it. The fact, too, that a life-saving station has been located on Sleeping Bear Point, 1¼ miles west of Glen Haven, and which assurance from the Department has been given will be erected the coming spring, makes the proposed line the more necessary. Glen Haven is also a station for the display of wind signals.

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., December 18, 1901.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have the honor to return herewith Senate bill 1464, to establish wind-signal display stations at South Manitou Island, Lake Michigan, and to recommend that the title of the bill be changed so as to provide for the establishing of "storm-warning stations" instead of "wind-signal stations." We have recently adopted the term "storm-warning" instead of "wind-signal."

In my opinion the establishing of storm-warning stations at South Manitou Island would prove of great value to lake marine interests, and I recommend that the sum of $15,000 be favorably considered by your committee.

Very respectfully,

JAMES WILSON, Secretary.

Hon. WILLIAM P. FRYE,
Chairman Committee on Commerce, United States Senate.

LIFE-SAVING SERVICE,
ASSISTANT TO SUPERINTENDENT OF CONSTRUCTION,
Glen Haven, Mich., December 18, 1901.

MY DEAR BISHOP: Having in mind the project of connecting South Manitou Island with the mainland, I wish to say that it has been my lot to be employed a good share of the fall on South Manitou Island, and during such sojourn I have become somewhat familiar of the inconvenience of being isolated from the world. I have been a week at a time without being able to communicate with the mainland on account of storm. During such storms I witnessed as high as 18 vessels taking shelter at the South Manitou Harbor during one storm. Every storm there were more or less vessels seeking safety in the harbor—there to lie, watch, and wait, with no means of knowing what the conditions were outside.

Many at times would willingly give most any price for the privilege of sending the one word "safe" to friends and owners, who alike are deeply interested. And no one can estimate the additional number of vessels that would take shelter there during storms if there were some means of hearing from the outside, that now take the risk of weathering the storm, and many times meeting with disaster, rather than to take shelter and be where they could have no communication with friends and owners. This is a vital question and interests the thousands of sailors employed on the Great Lakes as well as every owner of a dollar's worth of vessel property, and every shipper who has a dollar's worth of freight to move by vessels, not mentioning the anxiety of countless numbers of friends of those whose lives are imperiled in every storm that sweeps the Great Lakes.

No one knows whose vessels or whose friends may be benefited, as all the traffic of the Great Lakes that enters Lake Michigan is compelled to pass close to the islands, and the passage between the islands and the mainland is filled with points and numerous shoals which are a continual menace to navigation in thick weather, when every now and then a careful master is brought to grief by having his vessel suddenly brought up upon some shoal or point when he supposed he was in the regular channel. This has occurred many times in the past, and will continue to occur as long as vessels continue to navigate the great waterways. And who can estimate the thousands of dollars' worth of property that now is lost which might be saved if there were some means of communicating with the mainland so wrecking outfits might be summoned at once? An hour's delay many times loses all. And as our lake carriers increase in size the danger of striking shoals increases. And, further, if the assistance of life-savers were needed two stations could be brought to the rescue at once.
